These acts applied to merchandise produced by convicts, whether in factory, on farm, in the dairy, or elsewhere. These acts were intended to make the selling of convict-made goods so burdensome and so expensive that no merchant could qualify to handle them.

In several suits brought to test the constitutionality of these acts they were held unconstitutional, as in violation of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

However, these old acts in these 15 or 20 States are still on the statute books and have not been repealed. The manifest purpose of the Hawes-Cooper bill is to revitalize these old acts and to make effective similar acts the passage of which is to be pressed in several of the States with the same purpose and effect as the earlier statutes—that is, to destroy as far as possible all market for produce or merchandise created by convict labor.

If the Hawes-Cooper bill or any similar legislation is passed and held constitutional, each State might pass as unreasonable and as burdensome legislation affecting the sale of convict-made goods as the whims of any particular State legislature might dictate, with the result that the laws in all 48 States might differ very materially, so that any State producing or trying to sell its merchandise would have to know and comply with the law in 47 other different States.

THE HAWES-COOPER BILL UNCONSTITUTIONAL

Under the Constitution of the United States the power to regulate commerce between the States is lodged exclusively in Congress, and Congress has no power to delegate to the several States the right to regulate commerce among themselves.

The only right the several States have to interfere with or interrupt interstate commerce is in the exercise of the police power reserved to the States when the interstate commerce is immoral or fraudulent in its nature or dangerous to the public health.

The proponents of the Hawes-Cooper bill make no claim, and can not justly do so, that goods made by convicts are injurious to the morals or the health of the States.

The proponents of the Hawes-Cooper bill contend that the pending legislation is a copy of the Wilson Act of August 8, 1890, which divested intoxicating liquors of their interstate character and subjected such shipments to the laws of the State into which they should be shipped. If you will read the Wilson Act, you will see that the pending bill is not a copy of it, but that the Wilson Act expressly provided "All fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors, or liquids transported into any State or Territory * * * shall upon arrival in such State or Territory be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its police powers."

We believe we express practically the unanimous opinion of prison wardens and prison boards in the United States in protesting against the passage of the pending bill, or any legislation that interferes with the respective States in handling their domestic prison problems.

There are approximately 100,000 convicts in the United States, and not more than 50,000 of them are engaged in productive labor whose products are sold on the open market. It is estimated that the amount of goods produced by convicts and sold represents not more than one-twentieth of 1 per cent of the products of outside labor; the amount of the competition is infinitesimally small.

We have the feeling that the pending bill was inspired by and its passage urged by a highly organized minority of manufacturers, who have adopted this method of stopping prison-made manufacture in only one or two lines.

We have spent years in the effort to handle the penal problem of our respective States, and we hope that our earnest opposition to this bill will arouse you to the seriousness of the situation which would result from its passage.

Very respectfully,

FARM RELIEF

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I present a communication from Mr. J. C. Chase, of Orlando, Fla., with regard to pending Senate bill 1176 and House bill 7940, known as the McNary-Haugen farm relief bills.

I desire to say that Mr. Chase is one of the largest growers and shippers of citrus fruits in the State of Florida. I ask that his communication may lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHASE & CO.,
Orlando, Fla., April 7, 1928.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Hon. PARK TRAMMELL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATORS: Referring to Senate bill 1176 and House bill 7940, known as the McNary-Haugen farm relief bills.

These bills might be good legislation and desirable for staple, unperishable goods, such as grain, corn, and cotton, but we consider they would be very unwise legislation for the perishable industry and would impose unreasonable and unjust penalties upon that industry.

The bills provide for an advisory council and a revolving fund to provide for the control of any surplus of any agricultural commodity and to purchase or construct facilities for storage, sale, or disposition of such commodities.

Fresh fruits and vegetables can not be, owing to their perishable nature, classed with staple crops, like wheat, corn, and cotton, and it seems to us an exception should be made to these commodities in treating with this legislation.

Some fruits and vegetables are suitable for temporary storage, while others must go into immediate consumption. Some are suitable for export, while others must be sold on the domestic market. We do not feel that application of the principle outlined in these bills could be applied equitably. The best varieties and grades would, it seems to us, be compelled to bear the burden, and it might lead to encourage the slacker in the development of undesirable sizes and grades.

We believe it will appear to you that any State that may produce products which can be sold largely within the State would be relieved from the taxation on its product, while Florida would have imposed a tax on such products as they produce, practically all of which move in interstate commerce.

We respectfully urge, in the interest of the fruit and vegetable growers of this State and of the South, that you endeavor to have these bills amended to exclude their application to fresh fruits and vegetables.

Yours very truly,

J. C. CHASE.

Personal regards.

S. 2549. An act providing for payment to the German Government of $461.59 in behalf of the heirs or representatives of the German nationals, John Adolf, Herman Pegel, Franz Lipfert, Albert Wittenburg, Karl Behr, and Hans Dechantsreiter.

ROAD FROM ST. ELMO, TENN., TO ROSSVILLE, GA.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, from the Committee on Military Affairs, I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 5817) to provide for the paving of the Government road extending from St. Elmo, Tenn., to Rossville, Ga., and I submit a report (No. 723) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I did not gather what the nature of the bill is.

Mr. TYSON. I will state to the Senator from Washington that the bill, which has been passed by the House of Representatives, proposes to appropriate $75,000 for the building of a military road, commencing at the foot of Lookout Mountain at St. Elmo, Tenn., to Rossville, Ga. The bill has been reported unanimously by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JONES. Is this road entirely within a Government reservation or park?

Mr. McKELLAR. The road belongs to the Government.

Mr. JONES. And is it a military road in a military reservation?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; it belongs to the Government absolutely. It connects the military reservation on Lookout Mountain with the military reservation at Fort Oglethorpe. The War Department and the Bureau of the Budget have both recommended it, and I believe it unanimously passed the House. The bill provides that after the road is built it is to be turned over to the county, and the Government does not have to maintain it any longer. Seventy-five thousand dollars will not be enough to build the road, but the county of Hamilton will probably furnish the money necessary to complete it. This bill has the approval of the War Department, and, indeed, is in accordance with its usual policy in such cases. I hope there will be no objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $75,000, or so much of said sum as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in paving the Government road commencing at the pike at the foot of Lookout Mountain at St. Elmo, Tenn., and extending to the Rossville Boulevard, at Rossville, Ga., in the length of $3\frac{7}{10}$ miles, known as the Hooker Road: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended until the States of Georgia and Tennessee, or the counties or municipalities thereof concerned, have obligated themselves in writing to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War that they will accept title to and maintain said road under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1925 (sec. 418, title 18, U. S. C.), immediately upon the completion of such improvements as may be made under this appropriation.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SEC. 2. This act shall be in force and effect from and after its passage.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD also introduced a bill (S. 3972) to prevent corrupt practices in the nomination and election of President and Vice President of the United States, which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and, on request of Mr. SHIPSTEAD, ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

Be is enacted, etc., That whoever shall promise, offer, or give, or cause to be promised, offered, or given any money, office, job, or contract, or other thing of value to any person voting in the general election or voting as delegate in a national convention to vote or withhold his vote for or against any candidate for President or Vice President of the United States, or whoever solicits, accepts, or receives any money, office, job, contract, or other thing of value for his vote or for acting as delegate or alternate for such convention candidate for President or Vice President of the United States, shall be fined $1,000 or imprisoned for one year, or both, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 2. That all candidates for nomination for President and Vice President of the United States shall file with the Secretary of the Senate an itemized list of campaign receipts, expenses, and disbursements 30 days before the national convention from which he seeks nomination and again the day before said convention meets; such filing to be made by the candidate in person or by his designated manager or committee or State or district committees.

SEC. 3. That all committees, organizations, individuals, or corporations conducting voluntary and unsolicited, or solicited, publicity, or other political work for the political advancement of any announced or unannounced candidate for nomination for President or Vice President, shall file with the Secretary of the Senate an itemized list of receipts, expenses, and disbursements, together with names of persons participating in such political work, such filing to be 30 days before and again the day before the national convention to which the name of such announced or unannounced candidate or candidates is to be presented.

On request of Mr. SHIPSTEAD, the bill (S. 3914) to prevent the use of Federal official patronage in elections and prohibit Federal officeholders from misuse of positions of public trust for private and partisan ends, introduced by him on April 4 (calendar day of April 5), 1928, and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no person holding an appointive office of trust or profit under the Government of the United States shall be officer, committeeman, delegate, or alternate of any political convention, primary, caucus, or other organization, having for its aim the nomination or election of any candidate, avowed or unavowed, for President or Vice President of the United States.

SEC. 2. Violation of section 1 hereof shall be a felony punishable by a fine of $1,000 and by loss of his official position and shall bar him from holding any office, elective or appointive, under the Government of the United States for a period of five years.

AMENDMENT TO FARM RELIEF BILL

Mr. WATERMAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to Senate bill 3555, the farm relief bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

ACCEPTANCE OF STATUE OF ANDREW JACKSON

Mr. TYSON. On behalf of my colleague [Mr. MCKELLAR] and myself, I submit a resolution which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 192), as follows:

Resolved, That at 3 o'clock on April 16, 1928, exercises appropriate to the reception and acceptance from the State of Tennessee of the statue of Andrew Jackson, a former President of the United States, erected in Statuary Hall in the Capitol, be made the special order of the Senate.

Mr. TYSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. CURTIS. What is the hour and the day named?

Mr. MCKELLAR. Three o'clock on Monday.

Mr. TYSON. At 3 o'clock on Monday, April 16.

Mr. CURTIS. A week from to-day?

Mr. MCKELLAR. Yes; on Monday, April 16, at 3 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague [Mr. MCKELLAR] and myself, I also submit a concurrent resolution, which I ask may lie on the table.

The resolution (S. Con. Res. 14) was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the statue of Andrew Jackson, presented by the State of Tennessee to be placed in Statuary Hall, is accepted in the name of the United States, and that the thanks of Congress be tendered to the State of Tennessee for the contribution of the statue of one of the Nation's most eminent citizens, illustrious as a national hero and distinguished as a President of the United States.

Second. That a copy of these resolutions, suitably engrossed and duly authenticated, be transmitted to the Governor of the State of Tennessee.

FEDERAL OFFICES IN GEORGIA

Mr. GEORGE. On behalf of the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] and myself I offer a resolution providing for an investigation into the barter of Federal offices in Georgia and the collection of money or other thing of value from those holding Federal office. I ask that the resolution may be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. The complaints reaching me relate to post offices and the appointment of postmasters rather than officers coming under the civil service. I have had no complaint with reference to the appointment of officers not in the Postal Service.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to a question?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Does the resolution confine the investigation to such officers in Georgia or does it cover all the States?

Mr. GEORGE. It is confined to Georgia.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Does the Senator desire immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. GEORGE. I am not asking for immediate consideration of the resolution, because there are some matters which I wish to present to the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads in connection with the resolution.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I hope the Senator will not ask that the resolution be acted upon to-day, for I should like to offer an amendment to it.

Mr. GEORGE. I am asking that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, for the reason stated and because I wish to make some suggestions to that committee.

The resolution (S. Res. 193) was read and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, as follows:

Resolved, That a special committee of three Senators to be appointed by the President of the Senate is authorized and directed (1) to make a full and complete investigation of the barter of Federal offices in the State of Georgia, and particularly the facts with respect to any payment of money or anything of value, or promise to pay money or anything of value, before, upon, or after the appointment, to party officials or organizations or their agents or representatives, for the purpose of influencing appointments to such offices, and (2) to report thereon to the Senate as soon as practicable, with such recommendations for necessary legislation as it deems advisable. For the purposes of this resolution such committee is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places, to employ such experts and clerical, stenographic, and other assistance, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, and to take such testimony, and make such expenditures, as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic service to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of such committee, which shall not exceed ——, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

THE MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have an article from the Marine Journal relative to the work accomplished by the Shipping Board, written by John L. Bogert, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOGERT LOOKS AT THE CREDIT SIDE OF THE LEDGER FOR THE SHIPPING BOARD—ALL OF WHICH GOES TO SHOW THAT THE SHIPPING BOARD IS NOT ALWAYS THE VILLAIN OF THE PIECE AS MANY WOULD HAVE US BELIEVE, BUT HAS CONTRIBUTED SOME SOUND AND HIGHLY PRACTICAL AID TO THE PROBLEM OF PLACING THE AMERICAN FLAG ON THE SEAS

By John L. Bogert

One hundred and sixty-three shipping lines handle the foreign trade of the United States, and of that number 26 lines belong to the United States Shipping Board and are served by 300 ships in actual commission and 500 ships laid up but available for immediate use in emergencies. These 300 ships are all that are left of the 2,500 vessels inherited from the World War. Owing to the stupidity of our maritime policy, they cost us up to and above $225 per deadweight ton and are worth to-day scarcely $10 per deadweight ton. Tangible property, that cost us $3,500,000,000 10 years ago has shrunk 95 per cent. O triumphant democracy—when it comes to matters relating to the sea and foreign commerce, thy name is jackass!

THE SCAPEGOAT

And who has been made the scapegoat—and over whose head does the shifty opportunist, acting the rôle of political high priest, confess the maritime sins of the people and aim to send away into the wilderness of discredit forgetfulness? The United States Shipping Board.

When the Shipping Board spends money building up trade routes that have never before seen a single steamship flying the American flag, they are dubbed wastrels, and when they attempt to save for the Nation all they possibly can in disposing of the junk left on their hands, they are accused of trying to perpetuate Government operation of ships. As a matter of fact—and to give the devil his dues—the Shipping Board has cost the American people nothing. For every dollar of deficit their operation in foreign service has shown, they have saved the American exporter and importer $2 and possibly $3 and in some cases $4.

How do we get that saving stuff? Right here:

SOME ENLIGHTENING FIGURES

Last year the foreign trade of the United States was as follows:

Exports	$4,864,805,773
Total	9,049,203,955

Many years ago Mulhall, the great British statistician, stated that the average of all ocean freights bore a nearly fixed ratio to the actual value of the cargoes themselves. Now while Mulhall's figures and percentages are only of historic interest to-day—since the cost of transportation on the sea as well as on land tends constantly to sink—there is no great error involved in the assumption that ocean freights will average about 8 per cent of the value of the cargoes. In other words, our foreign commerce probably paid last year a freight bill of about $720,000,000.

THE FREIGHT-RATE PRINCIPLE

It is a well-known fact that the principle upon which freight rates are fixed is all the traffic will bear. Even in the early days when our sailing ships were supreme, it was nothing unusual for a ship to clear her entire first cost in one voyage, and American exporters and importers can hark back to the early days of the World War, when we had not yet entered "to make the elections safe for Democrats"—that ocean freight rates were high enough to justify enormous prices for superannuated tonnage of all kinds. So on more than one occasion in our history foreign freight rates have gone kiting.

A STABILIZING FACTOR

Since the war the United States Shipping Board has been the great steadying factor in the matter of foreign freight rates, performing on the seas the same service rendered by the Interstate Commerce Commission on land.

Five times within a few years foreign steamship owners have been compelled to revise their freight rates on important commodities downward, and in several instances the downward revision was drastic.

In 1924 we imported Egyptian cotton to the value of $22,954,000. What happened in this case is a conspicuous example. Again, when we sent $50,000,000 worth of food and supplies to the starving Russians the foreign steamship owners were prevented from getting a generous rake-off by the United States Shipping Board. Precisely the same thing occurred when our miners were on strike and Welsh coal had to be brought from Great Britain. With the situation reversed and British customers unable to use British coal because of closed mines, the Shipping Board ships saved many a dollar for our coal exporters. Recently we have been reading in the newspapers how the Shipping Board has again compelled the foreign shipowner to moderate his demands in the case of Indian jute.

WHAT WOULD HAPPEN?

These five separate and distinct instances are pretty good proof that should the Shipping Board and its ships be eliminated from participation in ocean carrying, our ocean freight rates would be at least 10 per cent greater than they now rule. In this connection it is well to bear in mind that it has been nothing unusual in the past for shipping conferences to raise or lower rates 20 per cent. Even 10 per cent of $720,000,000—our foreign commerce freight bill for last year—is $72,000,000! And so, in preventing the foreign shipowner from raising freight rates on American goods, whether for export or import, by the small amount of 10 per cent, the Shipping Board last year saved the American people $72,000,000.

This comfortable amount—$72,000,000—on the credit side of the ledger looks pretty good to the taxpayer as an off-set to the $18,000,000 spent by the Government in maintaining essential trade routes that have not yet grown sufficiently profitable to induce private American capital to take them over.

PROTECTING FREIGHT RATES

Remember there is as yet no international commerce commission to fix ocean freight rates, and the United States Shipping Board is the only body with the power and the "guts" to see that our foreign trade is not unduly preyed upon by the foreign shipowner, who is patriotically interested in helping his nationals in competition with America for foreign markets.

Under the fostering care and ministering services of the Shipping Board our foreign trade has grown in a very few years in value from $6,000,000,000 to $9,000,000,000. Moreover, American ship operators are bound to turn into American shipowners as our trade routes become more and more stabilized.

Two-thirds of all the original Shipping Board ships already sold—and among them some of the very best ships we had—have been sold to private American owners way below the price that it would cost to replace them.

Wherein has the Shipping Board failed to offer every practical inducement for private ownership and operation?

In the last analysis, the whole question is up to Congress. Without some kind of Government assistance—and this may take multivarious forms—no sane banker will lend a nickel to a shipowner proposing to face the competition offered by the foreigner in overseas trade. American ship operators are training a body of young Americans for the white-collar jobs of the shipping business, and American engine room, fireroom, and deck crews are being kept at sea instead of on land.

Surely the United States Shipping Board deserves some words of appreciation for the way in which they have handled an exceedingly difficult situation. It is open to question whether any of us could have done any better loaded down with a lot of war-time-built ships—ships that were built in some instances with the help of puny clerks, insurance salesmen, second-story dips, pugilists, baseball players, and even rabbis.

In another article I may possibly be able to point out why a 0.78 or 0.80 block coefficient ship is not a desirable piece of floating equipment to run on routes where the skipper is shouting for 13-knot ships.

LIVING CONFEDERATE PRINCIPLES

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, 63 years ago to-day, two generals met at the courthouse in Appomattox, Va., and exchanged greetings. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a copy of a speech delivered by Hon. Lloyd T. Everett at the Confederate veterans' reunion in this city on February 10, 1914.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The speech is as follows:

LIVING CONFEDERATE PRINCIPLES—A HERITAGE FOR ALL TIME

(An address delivered by Lloyd T. Everett, of Washington Camp, No. 305, Sons of Confederate Veterans, at the reception by the camp to the Confederate veterans of Washington, D. C., and vicinity, February 10, 1914. Revised. Copyright, 1915, by Lloyd T. Everett.)

"'DUTY' IS THE SUBLIMEST WORD IN THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE"

Mr. Commandant, Mr. Toastmaster, veterans, and comrades, we often hear it said that the glory of the Confederate soldier is imperishable and immortal; that his valor and devotion to duty have won for him a name and a fame that shall never die.

That is true. History shows us no equal to the splendid blend of physical and moral courage and long-sustained fortitude of the half-starved legions of Lee—certainly no superior. And while, to use a homely phrase, every tub must stand upon its own bottom, while each man must win for himself by his own worth his standing in the community, yet I prize as a priceless treasure the proud fact that I am the son of a Confederate soldier. Nor is this merely a matter of pride or of accidental honor to me. It is a very real incentive to look well to my own course and conduct in order that I may hand on untarnished the shining legacy that was bequeathed to me.

"'Duty' is the sublimest word in the English language" is a maxim that has been widely credited to our peerless Lee, although incorrectly so according to respectable authority. But in any event the sentiment is well worthy of General Lee, whose own life, public and private, was a superb illustration of the truth of the sublime epigram. And so unswerving and unfaltering devotion to duty is the glorious heritage which we Sons of Confederate Veterans, as sons of Confederate veterans, have acquired by reason of our lineage.

But it is not of the courage, valor, and endurance of the Confederate soldier that I wish particularly to speak on this occasion. Those cardinal virtues of Dixie's defenders have been extolled a thousand times over by tongues more fluent than mine. Nor is it my purpose to vindicate the course of the peoples of the Southern States in asserting and striving at all costs to maintain their independence under the exigencies of the particular crisis of 1860–61. The world is already coming to know, as we have always known, that we need no such vindication; that our open record is its own vindication.

No; it is another phase of what we may call the Confederate subject which I wish here to discuss, a phase which, it seems to me, has been too little featured and, I fear, too little recognized, even by our own chroniclers and advocates. And yet to my mind upon the general recognition of it depends the true progress of our own people, nay, of free government, and hence of civilization itself. And that phase or aspect of the general subject is this: The absolute soundness of the principles upon which the Southern Confederacy was bottomed; not merely the rightfulness of our stand for political independence under the peculiar circumstances of that time but the everlasting verity of the political and institutional ideals underlying our action; ideals vital and essential to all ages and climes as a goal toward which to press if the world is to have true liberty with progress.

For our Confederate war—our second war for independence Stonewall Jackson called it—was not a mere abortive revolution. We of the Southern States stood for great and fundamental principles of government, principles that meant and that still mean much for the advancement of free institutions and of human happiness.

And just as the valor of the Confederate soldier and the untold heroism of the Confederate woman are immortal, so with this larger view of the subject in mind I take a theme for consideration here and name it "Living Confederate principles—A heritage for all time."

AN ERA OF GOOD FEELING

The present is a time of peace and good will, of broad and tolerant sentiment, of generous breadth of view; in a word, it is an era of good feeling between the various sections of these United States.

Just now there is rolling past us the semicentenary of the war for southern independence—the Civil War—the War between the States or the sections—the War of the Rebellion (whether by the North or the South we need not here inquire)—call it what one will, everyone knows to what we here refer; that mighty clash of arms which to many of us is still most commonly referred to as, simply, the war. On every hand, to judge from the newspapers, are daily evidences of amity and cordiality between the gray and the blue; of honor accorded brave men by brave men. And in July, 1913, at Gettysburg, there was formally and finally buried—let us see, was it the twenty-seventh time, or the hundred and twenty-seventh time since the war with Spain?—"the last vestige of sectionalism." And when I see and hear all this, I am glad. For then I may claim the right to a respectful hearing on my chosen theme, even though certain views I hold regarding the war, its causes, its conduct, and its consequences may differ widely from those prevalent in the North, and even from those sometimes found in the South.

Nor is this era of good feeling confined to America. Just now a son of Virginia and of a Confederate veteran sits in the White House, and a grandson of Virginia is the premier of the Cabinet. From these two men of southern stock now at the helm of the ship of state has gone forth to all the world the message from this mighty Nation, Peace on earth, good will to men; not good will to men on earth from God in heaven, as on that Christmas morn 19 centuries ago, but peace on earth from men to men—in truth, a clarion call from a strong nation to the other nations of the earth, strong and weak alike; a call to these other nations to recognize as never before the brotherhood of man under the fatherhood of God, as it is sometimes expressed. Under the Bryan peace plan, if adopted, a long step forward will have been taken toward that happy era when "they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

This means a turning from the forum of force to the rule of reason; a substitution of calm argument or impartial arbitration for the dread arbitrament of war. Yea, veterans and descendants of the gray, it means a turning from the principles and practices of Lincoln and the North; it means the coming triumph of the underlying principles of the Confederate States of America.

THE CONFEDERACY'S PEACEABLE APPEAL

I know that it is often said that the Southern States appealed to the sword in their controversy with the Northern States. I am here to challenge that allegation, to absolutely deny its truth. And I can prove my contention from the record, and prove it to the verge of demonstration. That record shows that the South did not choose the arbitrament of the sword; it does show that she resorted to secession as the last hope of peace with honor.

Ours is preeminently a race of peace and progress through the channels of self-government. The history of our ancestors for a thousand years and more will sustain the truth of this claim. True, it is a history of internecine war, often, but largely so because it is the life story of men, and of many generations of men, who prized peace and order so highly that they were ever ready, if need be, to fight for it. Magna Charta, the Bill of Rights, the Petition of Right, the Revolution of 1688, the act of settlement—these are some of the monuments that mark the achievements of this orderly yet militant race. And these men laid the cornerstone of their structure in local self-government as the truest safeguard for an oppressed minority, and thus surest bulwark for political liberty itself. Yes; local self-government, or home rule, is of the very warp and woof of our institutions.

These salutary political principles, these racial characteristics were transplanted also to the kindly soil of the New World when a greater Britain was planted here.

It was in support of these principles that our Revolutionary sires protested against the unconstitutional stamp acts and similar taxation measures of England oppressive of the American minority, in the efforts of the mother country to recuperate for the expenses of the French and Indian War. At first they sought a peaceable remedy in the form of remonstrances, resolutions, and the like. When they found that these availed them not they then reluctantly accepted the gauge of battle flung in their faces by their haughty oppressors across the seas. Even after actual war was raging, these American patriots of British stock still indulged the fatuous dream of an unbroken British union and sought to wage their fight under the British Crown and as nearly as possible under the British flag. As he himself afterward declared, George Washington, when he took command of the rebel forces under authority from the Continental Congress, "abhorred the idea of independence."

THE CONSENT OF THE GOVERNED

But the logic of events soon brought forth the instrument officially entitled "The unanimous Declaration of the thirteen united States of America." (And, by the way, Declaration is written with a big D, united States with a little u and a capital S.) This immortal declaration laid down the fundamental doctrine that—

"Governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that, whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

This, our first war for independence, was successful. About the close of it these 13 independent republics formed a closer union among themselves, under what was known as the Articles of Confederation. This becoming unsatisfactory after a very few years, most of the constituent States seceded (which at the time was denounced by a few as unconstitutional and a breach of faith), and these seceding States, 11 in number, formed a new union under the Federal Constitution that was framed in 1787 and went into operation between these 11 States March 4, 1789. Afterwards the two remaining States of the old union—North Carolina and Rhode Island—also acceded to the new instrument.

As is well known, this new union was regarded with great jealousy and scrutinized very closely by a number of the continental fathers, the immortal Patrick Henry, the firebrand of the Revolution, and George Mason, author of the great Bill of Rights of Virginia, among the number. As just seen, political independence from the despotic central power of Britain had been gained by the assertion and maintenance of the right to change oppressive governments. But this struggle was won by force of arms and at the cost of much bloodshed; and the principle of the right to alter oppressive governments thus asserted in the Declaration of Independence might be construed, it was feared, to mean merely the right of revolution, and so the people of some of the United States, if thereafter oppressed by the central government to be created under the new Constitution might be left the right of separation, in self-defense, only by force of arms. And thus we would have progressed no whither in our supposed upward and onward march in the path of just and orderly self-government. Wherefore several of the States—Virginia, New York, and Rhode Island—in acceding to the new Constitution expressly reserved the right to peaceably withdraw or secede should they thereafter find it necessary to their happiness to do so.

MINORITY PROTECTION

This was an important advance in self-government and a further safeguard for the minority. The protection of the minority, be it remembered, was a primary object in the framing of the Federal Constitution, as stated at the time by James Madison, who is called the Father of the Constitution.

In the Virginian convention that ratified the Constitution of the United States, Delegate James Madison declared:

"But, on a candid examination of history, we shall find that turbulence, violence, and abuse of power by the majority trampling on the rights of the minority, have produced factions and commotions which, in republics, have more frequently than any other cause produced despotism. * * * If we consider the peculiar situation of the United States, and what are the sources of that diversity of sentiment which pervades its [sic] inhabitants, we shall find great danger to fear that the same causes may terminate here in the same fatal effects which they produced in those republics. This danger ought to be wisely guarded against."

Madison advocated the adoption of the Constitution as affording the needed protection to the minority.

COERCION VOTED DOWN IN THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

Remember that: The Constitution of the United States was framed and adopted, the union of the States thereunder was formed, for the peaceable protection of the minority against the oppressions of the majority. And mark this: It was proposed by some to embody in the Constitution a power to coerce States that might refuse to obey the laws of Congress. Madison (still the father of the Constitution) said this would mean war; and the proposal was voted down.

Well, time went on. Sectional differences and jealousies speedily developed between the Southern and the Northern States. Under Jefferson, a southern President, the great trans-Mississippi Territory of Louisiana was bought from Napoleon, in 1803; and thereby the area of the United States was approximately doubled. New England thought that this would strengthen the South at the expense of the North. Accordingly, New England threatened secession.

New England was at this time a commercial or seafaring country, and had as yet few manufactures. The embargo law of Jefferson's second administration was unpopular in this sea-trading New England, and again loud mutterings of secessionist purposes were heard up there. The State of Louisiana was admitted in 1812, despite the celebrated threat of Josiah Quincy, of Massachusetts, on the floor of Congress in 1811, that such admission of a new Southern State from a part of the Louisiana Purchase would constitute adequate cause for secession by some of the Northern States, "amicably if they can, violently if they must."

But conditions soon changed. The War of 1812 cut us off from Europe, whence we had theretofore obtained most of our manufactured goods; and New England, her sea trade interrupted by the war, with commendable energy and enterprise now began to manufacture. During this war the famous Hartford Convention, of New England, met with a large-sized list toward secession. After the war New England and the North generally began to find the Union a good thing for them; it furnished a free market—the Southern States—for buying the manufacturers' raw materials; it furnished a "protected" market—still largely the Southern States—for selling the manufactured goods.

A FIRE BELL IN THE NIGHT

But New England and the rest of the North were still painfully jealous of new Southern and Western or Southwestern States. They opposed the admission of Missouri, 1819, and now first raised seriously the question of negro slavery as a sectional issue. Thomas Jefferson was himself, like many other Southerners, in favor of the abolition of slavery; a peaceable abolition. But he could see further into the future than could most men. So now, when this Missouri-slavery issue was raised by New England and the North, for the purpose of keeping the new lands of the West for themselves as against the South, the aged Jefferson wrote that it roused him as a fire bell in the night, and portended a disastrous sectional struggle.

But to return to the tariff. The tariff question, as a serious sectional issue, first came to a head about 1830. Having once gotten hold of the nursing bottle of "protection," so called, in 1816 and 1820, New England and the North cried ever for more. The tariff of 1820 was followed by that of 1824, and that in turn by the "tariff of abominations" in 1828. These were sectional measures, and the South felt herself being oppressed and impoverished by the combined northern and northwestern majority. The tariff act of 1832 was of the same stripe as its predecessors. Out of this situation came the nullification crisis of 1830–1833.

Early in 1830 occurred the memorable debate in the Senate of the United States between Robert Y. Hayne, of South Carolina, and Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts. Just three years later, early in 1833, a similar debate took place between the same Mr. Webster on one side and, on the other side, Hayne's successor in the Senate, the immortal John C. Calhoun. Hayne and Calhoun were the champions of the South in the pending sectional controversy; Webster, of the North. In these debates Webster is said to have "shotted every gun" that was fired for the North in the great war of 30 years later. If this be so, careful attention is due to this Titans' war, this battle of the forensic giants, and to the great constitutional and institutional arguments then advanced.

The immediate issue was the tariff. The Southern States, and especially South Carolina, contended that the existing tariff laws were devised for protecting Northern manufacturers, and so imposed a sectional burden upon the agricultural South; they contended, further, that there was no warrant for anything more than a revenue tariff; that a tariff for "protection," as it is called, was utterly unconstitutional.

Whether the South was correct on these two points, viz, the injurious effects of a "protective" tariff at that time, upon the South, and the unconstitutionality of such a tariff—with these two questions we are not here concerned. But from this starting point the debates ranged out and covered other two questions which do here concern us. And these are, first, How are disputed questions of constitutionality, arising between States or groups of States in the Union, to be determined? Second, the nature of the union, whether a union of States as States, or of the American people in one aggregate mass. To take these up briefly, in inverse order to that just given:

Calhoun introduced in the Senate a series of resolutions, three in number, which are well worth the careful study of every student of republican institutions, every lover of human freedom. These resolutions recited the strictly Federal character, under the Constitution of 1787–1789, of the Union of American States; with the resultant right, to the States, "of judging, in the last resort, as to the extent of the powers delegated" to the central Government and, consequently, of those reserved to the several States, and that action by the central Government based upon the contrary assumption must inevitably tend to undue consolidation and to "the loss of liberty itself."

"WE THE PEOPLE"

Webster vehemently attacked these resolutions. His argument may be thus epitomized, largely in his own words: How can any man get over the words of the preamble to the Constitution itself, "We the people of the United States * * * do ordain and establish this Constitution"; that these words forbid the turning of the instrument into a mere compact between sovereign States; that, in framing and putting into operation the Constitution of the United States, "a change had been made from a confederacy of States to a different system, * * * a Constitution for a National Government"; that "accession, as a word applied to political associations, implies coming into a league, treaty, or confederacy, by one hitherto a stranger to it"; that, "in establishing the present Government" (i. e., the Government of the United States as it stood in Webster's time) the "people of the United States * * * do not say that they accede to a league, but they declare that they ordain and establish a Constitution, * * * some of them employing the * * * words 'assented to' and 'adopted,' but all of them 'ratifying'"; that "the Constitution of the United States is not a league, confederacy, or compact between the people of the several States in their sovereign capacities"; that "the natural converse of accession is secession."

Note the several test words here: Confederacy, constitution, national, compact, and accede.

As to every one of them Webster was wrong, as may be shown from the debates and official documents accompanying and preceding the framing and adoption of the Federal Constitution. We have not the time to examine fully into all these test words here. To one or two of these words let us devote a few sentences.

First, then, as to the phrase, "We the people of the United States." The preamble to the Federal Constitution does use this expression. But Article VII of the instrument itself provides that "The ratification of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same." Mark you these most significant words, "between the States." It is not provided that the ratification of this Constitution by a prescribed majority of the whole people of the then existing United States under the Articles of Confederation shall establish it over the whole people of all those United States (a provision that would have been an utter nullity, for stubborn historical reasons), but that its ratification by a certain number of the States shall establish it between—not over, but between those particular States, and none others, unless and until such others shall also ratify, each for itself.

Bearing in mind this Article VII of the Federal Constitution, the preamble becomes plain. A cardinal canon of construction is, that if possible all the parts of a written instrument shall be so construed as to be harmonious with each other. The "people of the United States," then, here means the people—or peoples—of those several distinct States which may elect to establish the proposed constitution between themselves. And, indeed, this Constitution of 1787, and the Union under it, first went into effect between 11 of the States only, as we have remarked above; North Carolina and Rhode Island remaining separate and independent Republics until, after President Washington's inauguration, they chose, each for itself, to come into the new Union or Confederacy.

So we see that Mr. Webster's centralist construction of the word or phrase, "the people," as used in the Constitution, falls to the ground.

But again Webster denies that the States acceded to the Constitution; and mark well his daring and all-important admission that "the natural converse of accession is secession."

Now, it so happens that this word accede, or its derivative accession, which he thus spurns, is found in the very sense which he denies to it over and over again in the debates of those who framed and adopted the Constitution; and at least once in the course of the official documents pertaining to its adoption; over and over again I say, or some forty times by actual count, either certainly or probably in this sense and more than twenty times unquestionably so. To give but three instances here:

James Madison said, in the Virginian convention of 1788 that debated and, by a close majority, ratified the system for Virginia: "Suppose eight States only should ratify and Virginia should propose certain alterations as the previous condition of her accession." In the North Carolina State convention Governor Johnston said: "We are not to form a constitution, but to say whether we—i. e., the people of North Carolina—shall adopt a constitution to which 10 States have already acceded." And the ratifying convention of New York—of which Alexander Hamilton was a member—prepared by unanimous order a circular letter containing this language: "Our attachment to our sister States and the confidence we repose in them can not be more forcibly demonstrated than by acceding to a government which many of us think very imperfect."

Webster was right; "secession is the converse of accession." Moreover, as we have seen above, at least three States—Virginia, Rhode Island, and New York—in their formal acts of ratification of the Federal Constitution expressly and explicitly reserved this right of secession or peaceable withdrawal; a fact now well known and now generally acknowledged by South and North alike.

But another question asked in those debates of the early thirties was, as stated above, How shall disputed questions of constitutional rights and powers to be decided? By the Federal Supreme Court, said Webster, so as to bind even sovereign States, and in all cases.

"No," said South Carolina, in substance, speaking through Hayne and Calhoun, "the Constitution of the United States empowers the Federal Supreme Court to decide only 'all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made * * * under their authority.'" That is the language of the Constitution: "all cases in law and equity." And questions of sovereignty, argued South Carolina, come not within the scope of cases in law and equity, which are limited, by the well-known common-law use of the term, to an altogether different class of cases. The historical correctness of this contention of South Carolina's is supported by James Madison in his journal of the Constitutional Convention. Madison, the reporter, says of himself, the delegate:

"ALL CASES IN LAW AND EQUITY"

"James Madison doubted whether it was not going too far to extend the jurisdiction of the Federal Supreme Court generally to cases arising under the Constitution, and whether it ought not to be limited to cases of a judiciary nature." (The contention of Hayne and Calhoun exactly.) "The right of expounding the Constitution in cases not of this nature ought not to be given to that department.

"The [pending] motion of Doctor Johnson was agreed to nem. con., it being generally supposed that the jurisdiction given was constructively limited to cases of a judiciary nature." As if to clinch the matter beyond a peradventure, the words "in law and equity" were afterward inserted into the jurisdiction clause here discussed.

(Just a word here as to the man here quoted as authority, James Madison, of Virginia, "father of the Constitution." From the standpoint of a constitutional constructionist, Madison's career was somewhat that of a pendulum. Rather centralistic at the time of the general convention of 1787 that framed the Constitution and submitted it to the States for ratification or rejection—certainly moderately so, as disclosed by his own utterances from time to time in the debates of that convention, a very few years later he became Jefferson's own right-hand man in opposing the radically centralistic trend of the Adams administration; in his old age, and at the time of the nullification crisis which we are now discussing, he seems to have reverted toward his earlier position. As a centralist, then, at the time he took part in and reported the debates of the General Constitutional Convention of 1787, whatever Madison noted down of a contrary tendency is deserving of special attention and weight.)

But if not the Federal Supreme Court, then what tribunal, inquired Webster and the North, is to decide these disputed questions of sovereignty and of constitutional powers? The answer was ready to hand: Not to the Federal Supreme Court, itself but a component part of the created central government, where three men (a majority of a quorum of the court), and they political appointees, may have the deciding voice, must a sovereign creator State submit questions affecting her sovereign powers. She herself will decide it pending an appeal, in the true spirit of Magna Charta, to the judgment of her peers, her sister sovereign creator States in general convention assembled. This contention had had the support of Thomas Jefferson in 1821, as quoted by Hayne: "It is a fatal heresy to suppose that either our State governments are superior to the Federal or the Federal to the State; neither is authorized literally to decide what belongs to itself, or its copartner in government, in differences between their different sets of public servants; the appeal is to neither, but to their employers peaceably assembled by their representatives in convention." More than 20 years before this utterance Jefferson had embodied this same principle in his draft of the famous Kentucky resolutions. Again, Jefferson wrote: "This peaceable and legitimate resource, a general convention of the States, to which we are in the habit of implicit obedience, superseding all appeal to force, and being always within our reach, shows a precious principle of self-preservation in our composition. * * *"

Mark this: Jefferson says that in this plan of a general convention of the States to decide such mooted questions of constitutional construction and governmental powers is found a peaceable settlement of vexing political and sectional problems. This was precisely Carolina's plea in 1830–1833.

Right or wrong, thundered President Jackson, these Federal laws must be obeyed unless and until repealed by the same power—Congress—that enacted them, or unless and until declared unconstitutional by the Federal Supreme Court; and if not voluntarily obeyed, then obedience shall be enforced by the fratricidal sword. To like effect argued Webster. You have the right, said he, to resist laws deemed oppressive, if you so please—but it is the right of revolution, no more; justifiable only if successful, and if not successful, subject to the dread penalties of high treason.

POWER VERSUS LIBERTY

Ours is a constitutional remedy, Hayne replied, and a peaceable one. (a) The right of revolution exists independently of the Constitution. That instrument expressly declares that all powers not delegated to the central government remain to the several States, or the people; that is, to the people of those several States. This power of deciding the constitutionality or the unconstitutionality of laws of Congress, being not given in the Constitution either to Congress or to the Federal Supreme Court, remains to the several States. Ours is a peaceable remedy—unless you of the North force on us the issue of war. And only if honor with peace within the Union be found no longer possible, then will we exercise that other peaceable remedy of secession or withdrawal from the partnership of States in order that, like Abraham and Lot of old, we may dwell apart in peace, rather than remain together in dissension. And if you, like George III, still pursue us with hostile intent and the sword be drawn, then upon you of the North, not upon us, must the awful responsibility rest.

For answer to this plea of peace by South Carolina, Jackson, Webster, and the North passed the Force Bill, as it was called, of 1833; a bill providing for the enforcement of the tariff laws, if need be, by force of arms. But at the same time, in view of South Carolina's determined front, and signs of growing support for her from other Southern States, Jackson and Congress passed also the Clay compromise bill scaling down the tariff to meet Carolina's demands.

So ended the matter for the time. The sword was threatened but not drawn, and South Carolina's peaceable remedy for an oppressed sectional minority prevailed. And mark this: State nullification or State veto, as here preached by Hayne and Calhoun and practiced by their native State, was a qualified nullification only, a fact too often entirely overlooked; an interposition of the State's sovereignty pending an appeal to a three-fourths decision of the Confederated States in general convention. It was, in effect, a Federal referendum (b). It was strictly conservative of true constitutional principles. For, let us repeat, a prime object of the Federal Constitution was the protection of the rights of the minority.

This struggle of the early thirties of the nineteenth century was, as Calhoun averred at the time, a contest between power, or the North, and liberty, or the South. Calhoun drew a close parallel between that contest and that other of 1776, with Northern unjust taxation of the South in 1833 bearing a marked analogy to the British unjust taxation of the American Colonies in 1776.

THE GREAT CONFOUNDER OF THE CONSTITUTION

That both of these contentions of South Carolina—i. e., qualified nullification, with secession in reserve—were sound, historically and constitutionally sound, we have just seen. That the contrary contention of Webster was unsound, unconstitutional, and unhistorical, must necessarily follow. Daniel Webster has been called the "Expounder of the Constitution." I respectfully submit that great "Confounder of the Constitution" would be a more fitting title. His admirer and biographer, and a successor to him in the Federal Senate from Massachusetts, Hon. Henry Cabot Lodge, says of Webster's argument here, "The weak places in his armor were historical in their nature." Of Webster on a somewhat similar occasion the same writer says, "But the speech is strongly partisan and exhibits the disposition of an advocate to fit the Constitution to his particular case." Likewise, Webster's apologist, Von Holst, discussing this very debate with Calhoun, sadly confesses that "to his and his country's harm, the advocate in him always spoke loudly in the reasoning of the statesman."

Yes; Daniel Webster was a great lawyer, an able advocate, a magnificent orator. But as a constitutional student he was superficial. The close of his speech known as "Webster's Reply to Hayne" is a burst of splendid oratory and is known and quoted far and wide. Only less eloquent, far more sound, is the little-known peroration to Hayne's rejoinder, which should be called "Hayne's Reply to Webster." Mr. Webster said:

A MEANS INSEPARABLE FROM THE END SOUGHT?

"While the Union lasts we have high, exciting, gratifying prospects spread out before us, for us and our children. Beyond that I seek not to penetrate the veil. God grant that, in my day at least, that curtain may not rise. God grant that on my vision never may be opened what lies behind. When my eyes shall be turned to behold for the last time the sun in heaven, may I not see him shining on the broken and dishonored fragments of a once glorious Union; on States dissevered, discordant, belligerent; on a land rent with civil feud, or drenched, it may be, in fraternal blood! Let their last feeble and lingering glance rather behold the gorgeous ensign of the Republic, now known and honored throughout the earth, still full high advanced, its arms and trophies streaming in their original luster, not a stripe erased or polluted, not a single star obscured—bearing for its motto no such miserable interrogatory as, What is all this worth? nor those other words of delusion and folly, Liberty first and union afterwards; but everywhere, spread all over in characters of living light, blazing on all its ample folds, as they float over the sea and over the land, and in every wind under the whole heavens, that other sentiment, dear to every true American heart—Liberty and union, now and forever, one and inseparable!"

Grand, glorious—rhetorically, but it is not logic—nor yet history. According to Webster, the perpetuity of the then existing American Union was essential to the continued enjoyment of liberty. But the Declaration of Independence, mindful of the rise and fall of nations and the ever-recurring changes in governments, tells us that all governments are but means to an end, and that end the securing of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that here, as in any other case, when a particular means fails to effect the end in view, it should be discarded for some other means. Forgetful, too, was Webster of Washington's language in his revered Farewell Address, wherein he denominates the Union under the Constitution of 1787–1789 an "experiment," and warns against "geographical discriminations" as "causes which may disturb our Union." To like effect to this last, as seen above, spoke Jefferson on "the Missouri question"; but these solemn admonitions of Washington and of Jefferson, Webster and, after him, Lincoln, heeded not.

Thus Mr. Webster in 1833, for union at any cost, when those whom he opposed themselves opposed the tariffs laws which, by means of "geographical discriminations," favored his own New England and the North. To far different effect had he spoken some 17 years before when, a Member of the House of Representatives from New Hampshire, he voiced New England's fierce opposition to the then raging war with old England and to the pending enlistment bill for carrying on that war: "I use not the tone of intimidation or menace," thundered young Representative Webster, "but I forewarn you of consequences. * * * I beseech you, by the best hopes of your country's prosperity—by your regard for the preservation of her Government and her Union—that you abandon your system of restrictions—that you abandon it at once and abandon it forever."

But to return to the great debate of 1830. Said General Hayne in reply to Webster's "reply":

FREEDOM BEFORE UNION

"The gentleman has made an eloquent appeal to our hearts in favor of union. Sir, I cordially respond to that appeal. I will yield to no gentleman here in sincere attachment to the Union; but it is a Union founded on the Constitution, and not such a union as that gentleman would give us that is dear to my heart. If this is to become one great 'consolidated government,' swallowing up the rights of the States, and the liberties of the citizen, 'riding over the plundered plowmen and beggared yeomanry,' the Union will not be worth preserving. Sir, it is because South Carolina loves the Union, and would preserve it forever, that she is opposing now, while there is hope, those usurpations of the Federal Government which, once established, will, sooner or later, tear this Union into fragments.

"The gentleman is for marching under a banner studded all over with stars and bearing the inscription, 'Liberty and Union.' I had thought, sir, the gentleman would have borne a standard, displaying in its ample folds a brilliant sun, extending its golden rays from the center to the extremities, in the brightness of whose beams the 'little stars hide their diminished heads.' Ours, sir, is the banner of the Constitution; the 24 stars are there in all their undiminished luster; on it is inscribed, 'Liberty—the Constitution—union.' We offer up our fervent prayers to the Father of all mercies that it may continue to wave for ages yet to come over a free, a happy, and a united people."

Hayne has been criticized as having violated a cardinal rule of oratory and having attempted to equal Webster's peroration in his own. But another view may be urged. The ablest generals—such as Lee, Jackson, and Napoleon—are often those who on occasions transgress fundamental canons of strategy, success as a result being their only justification. Hayne, at once orator, patriot, and logician, both felt the power of Webster's closing plea and its glowing imagery as it would appeal to men, and perceived its basic fallacy as applied. He proceeded, boldly and deliberately, to borrow his great antagonist's own figure of speech and turn it against him. In the brief space of the closing four sentences of the peroration just quoted, Hayne reproduces in outline the picture drawn so fully and so masterfully by Webster, dissects it, suggests a more fitting one to accord with his opponent's expressed principles, appropriates the original as properly illustrating his own position, and ends with the "fervent" and pertinent invocation that it may long be suffered to remain the true emblem of a people free and happy as well as united.

Hayne's peroration is not so elaborate or ornate as Webster's, nor was it meant to be. But it is perfect in itself. The keen, logical criticism, blended with the quiet, delicate sarcasm conveyed in the reference to the "brilliant sun" and the "little stars," is exquisite; the true application of Webster's stellar picture is simple and effective. After the "fire, the wind, and the earthquake" of Webster's mighty finish it comes as a still small voice.

And so the South triumphed with and through this remedy of peaceable protection for a sectional minority. The North, thus baffled, next resorted to a wily flank move.

A WILY FLANK MOVE

The next great sectional crisis (after the preliminary and premonitory one of 1850) came nearly a third of a century later. In the crisis just discussed, involving the nullification clash of 1830–1833, the tariff was the bone of contention. In this second crisis negro slavery in the Territories was the occasion, not the cause, as is imagined by many who should know better.

What was the actual source of this "free-soil" or "antislavery" crusade of the North? An aroused moral sense, say some. Fanaticism, say others. Partly each of these, but not exclusively or chiefly either or both, say I.

Mark well this fact: In the debates in Congress on the tariff dispute of 1833 John Quincy Adams, ex-President of the United States and then a Member of the House of Representatives, uttered this significant remark from the floor of the House: "But protection might be extended in different forms to different interests. * * * In the southern and southwestern portion of the Union there exists a certain interest [by which Adams meant negro slavery] which enjoys under the Constitution and the laws of the United States an especial protection, peculiar to itself" (i. e., return of fugitive slaves escaping from one State into another). He referred to the slaves in the Southern States as "machinery," and added, "If they [the Southern States] must withdraw protection from the free white labor of the North [the 'protection' of a high tariff, Adams meant], then it ought to be withdrawn from the machinery of the South."

Ah, here we have the milk in the coconut; or perhaps it would be appropriate to say the African in the fuel heap. In the framing of the Federal Constitution the North and the South—rather, New England and the far Southern States—arranged a quid pro quo, by which the shipping interests of New England obtained control, and permanent control, of commercial regulations by a mere majority vote, instead of a two-thirds vote, in the Congress, and the South, together with the slave-importing shippers of this same New England, defeated the possibility of prohibition of the continued importation of negroes temporarily or for some 19 years. And now, her darling of sectional customs "protection" in danger from South Carolina's firm stand, New England, through John Quincy Adams as her spokesman, gave warning in 1833 that tariff "protection," although not guaranteed by the Constitution, and slavery protection, which was expressly guaranteed by that instrument, must be held as twin special interests, to stand or fall together.

In this light, then, these remarks of Adams, of Massachusetts, should be carefully marked and constantly borne in mind in connection with the subsequent growth and course of antisouthern agitation, under the guise of an antislavery crusade, from the time—this time of South Carolina's nullification stand and the resultant tariff reduction of 1833—that a definite check was placed upon high tariff, North-favoring legislation. And this is the same Mr. Adams who shortly thereafter began to make his declining years renowned by pouring into the House of Representatives at Washington his broadsides of "antislavery" or antisouthern petitions.

Finally a new party was formed, with its primary object, as professed, the exclusion of the South with her Constitution-guaranteed property from the common territories that had been acquired by the common blood and the common treasure of the South and the North. And, significantly, early in its history, or as soon (1860) as it had acquired material growth and substantial prestige, this new political party, already thus avowedly sectional in its principles, made a sectional "protective" tariff one of its demands. And when it had elected a President (by a sectional and a minority popular vote, be it remembered) and so caused a disruption of the Union of States, "protection" was a primary means employed to support the war that followed—a war of aggression and conquest waged by this party to secure both its own continued supremacy and the new consolidated and un-American union of force in place of the pristine confederated union of choice which itself had done so much to destroy; a war in which negro emancipation in parts of the Southern States was incidentally proclaimed as a military measure, the thirteenth amendment coming later to extend and validate this unconstitutional proceeding. "Un-American union of force," I said; we must remember that widespread opposition to the war of conquest against the South manifested itself in the North, and that the myriads of immigrants from centralist, "blood-and-iron" Germany had much to do with turning the scale in the North in support of Lincoln's and Seward's war. (c) In these aliens there had arisen "a new king which knew not Joseph," who had no inconvenient recollections of seventy-six to hold him in check. [Note: The foregoing was originally written before the outbreak of the European war of 1914, much of the responsibility for which must be laid to the charge of this same "blood-and-iron" nation.]

This so-called free-soil movement was more accurately styled a white-soil movement. For hand in hand with the efforts to keep negro slaves out of the new States and Territories of the North and the West went drastic antifree negro laws in those regions as well as in the older Northern States. (These laws are to be found discussed most illuminatingly in Ewing's Legal and Historical Status of the Dred Scott Decision, Ch. IV. See also Northern Rebellion and Southern Secession, by the same author, p. 113.) The negro, slave or free, was not wanted in the North and West. Long since had Jefferson, the honest abolitionist, pointed out that "The passage of slaves from one State to another would not make a slave of a single human being who would not be so without it. So their diffusion over a greater surface would make them individually happier and proportionally facilitate the accomplishment of their emancipation by dividing the burden on a greater number of coadjutors." This warning, like those other warnings of Jefferson and Washington above mentioned, of course, went unheeded by the negro exclusionists of the North and Northwest.

ABRAHAM AND LOT AGAIN

Nullification, or State veto subject to Federal referendum, was practicable in 1833; practicable and successful. In 1860–61 it was not practicable, because a State could not exercise her veto power out in the common territories where the sectional northern party that had just been elected to power threatened antisouthern legislation. Hence, when peace with honor was no longer possible within the union of States, the Southern States turned to the only possible peaceable alternative, secession, or complete withdrawal from that interstate compact of government already so flagrantly violated in act and in promise of further acts to come by their northern sisters.

That the voice and efforts, the counsels and measures of the Southland were still for peace the record abundantly proves.

Sturdy little South Carolina, faithful to the spirit of her departed Hayne and Calhoun, was the first State to withdraw. On her invitation delegates from five other of the cotton States that followed her in withdrawing and later those from a sixth, Texas, met her own delegates in a congress at Montgomery, Ala., February 4, 1861. By this congress was framed the provisional constitution of the Confederate States of America. Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi, was chosen Provisional President of the new union.

On February 15, 1861, before the arrival of Mr. Davis at Montgomery to take the oath of office, the congress passed a resolution providing "that a commission of three persons be appointed by the President elect as early as may be convenient after his inauguration and sent to the Government of the United States for the purpose of negotiating friendly relations between that Government and the Confederate States of America and for the settlement of all questions of disagreement between the two governments upon principles of right, justice, equity, and good faith."

Truly, as Mr. Stephens, of Georgia, one of the delegates to this Montgomery congress, says in his history of the United States these "were not such men as revolutions or civil commotions usually bring to the surface. * * * Their object was not to tear down so much as it was to build up with the greater security and permanency." And we may add that they meant to build up, if so permitted, peaceably.

In this spirit of amity and justice the first act of the Louisiana State convention, after passing the ordinance of secession, was to adopt, unanimously, a resolution recognizing the right to free navigation of the Mississippi River (which flows down from the Northern States of the great inland basin and empties into the sea within the confines of Louisiana), and further recognizing the right of egress and ingress at that river's mouth and looking to the guaranteeing of these rights.

President Davis's inaugural address, delivered February 18, 1861, breathed the same spirit of friendship toward our brothers of the North. He said, in part:

OUR PRESIDENT'S INAUGURAL

"Our present political position has been achieved in a manner unprecedented in the history of nations. It illustrates the American idea that governments rest on the consent of the governed, and that it is the right of the people to alter or abolish them at will whenever they become destructive of the ends for which they were established. The declared purpose of the compact of the union from which we have withdrawn was to 'establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, (d) provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to our selves and our posterity'; and when, in the judgment of the sovereign States composing this confederation, it has been perverted from the purposes for which it was ordained and ceased to answer the ends for which it was established, a peaceful appeal to the ballot box declared that, so far as they are concerned, the government created by that compact should cease to exist. In this they merely asserted the right which the Declaration of Independence of July 4, 1776, defined to be 'inalienable.' * * *

"Thus the sovereign States here represented have proceeded to form this Confederacy; and it is by abuse of language that their act has been denominated a revolution. They formed a new alliance, but within each State its government has remained; so that the rights of person and property have not been disturbed. The agent through which they communicated with foreign nations is changed, but this does not necessarily interrupt their international relations. Sustained by the consciousness that the transition from the former union to the present Confederacy has not proceeded from a disregard on our part of just obligations, or any failure to perform every constitutional duty, moved by no interest or passion to invade the rights of others, anxious to cultivate peace and commerce with all nations, if we may not hope to avoid war, we may at least expect that posterity will acquit us of having needlessly engaged in it. * * *

"An agricultural people, whose chief interest is the export of commodities required in every manufacturing country, our true policy is peace, and the freest trade which our necessities will permit. * * * If a just perception of mutual interest shall permit us peaceably to pursue our separate political career, my most earnest desire will have been fulfilled. But if this be denied to us, and the integrity of our territory and jurisdiction be assailed, it will but remain for us with firm resolve to appeal to arms and invoke the blessing of Providence on a just cause."

SOUTHERN OLIVE BRANCHES

Nor did our President content himself with mere words of peace. He promptly acted on the resolution of Congress above cited, and appointed three commissioners from our Government to the Government of the United States. "These commissioners," says Mr. Stephens, "were clothed with plenary powers to open negotiations for the settlement of all matters of joint property, forts, arsenals, arms, or property of any other kind within the limits of the Confederate States, and all joint liabilities with their former associates, upon principles of right, justice, equity, and good faith."

Let me ask, Could anything have been fairer?

These commissioners promptly proceeded on their way. A few days after the inauguration of Mr. Lincoln at Washington they formally notified his Secretary of State, Mr. Seward, that "the President, Congress, and people of the Confederate States earnestly desire a peaceful solution" of pending questions between the two Governments. The full history of these negotiations makes mighty interesting reading. But it is too long a story to be rehearsed in detail here. Suffice it to say that it was through no fault of these commissioners, or of the people and government they represented, that their mission of peace and good will to their late allies of the North came to naught.

South Carolina, shortly after her secession in December, 1860, had taken like steps looking to peace, by sending a commission to negotiate with Buchanan's administration relative to former United States property within her limits.

Yet another effort for peace was made from a southern official quarter in those portentous, ominous months following the sectional victory at the polls in November, 1860. The provisional Confederate Constitution mentioned above was framed and adopted by what were called the seven Cotton States. The border Southern States were yet within the old Union, hoping against hope for continued union, peace, and justice. Among these border States was Virginia, the oldest, the most powerful of them all. By unanimous vote of her legislature all the States of the Union were invited to send commissioners to a conference, to devise some plan for preserving harmony and constitutional union.

This conference met in Washington, February 4, 1861, the very day on which the Congress of the seceded cotton States assembled in Montgomery. It adjourned February 27. Significantly enough, in view of our present argument, this conference at Washington was called the peace congress. The demands or suggestions of the South in this peace congress were only that constitutional obligations should be observed by all parties; nay, that certain concessions to the North would be agreed to, by means of constitutional amendment, if only the Constitution, as thus amended, might be obeyed. This did not suit the commissioners from the Northern States, as was bluntly stated by one of them then and there, Salmon P. Chase, of Ohio, who was slated for a portfolio in Lincoln's Cabinet, and, therefore, spoke at least quasi et cathedra. So the Peace Congress proved of no avail (e).

We find a similar situation in the Congress of the United States at its regular session that winter. Of the condition there Mr. Pollard says, in his book, The Lost Cause, "It is remarkable that of all the compromises proposed in this Congress for preserving the peace of the country, none came from Northern men; they came from the South and were defeated by the North."

Well might the Southern leaders have adopted for their own the language of the psalmist, "I am for peace; but when I speak they are for war."

It was by virtue of this impossible condition arising within the old union that Southern States, cotton and border, one by one found it necessary to withdraw from that union—which was effected so far as possible, in every instance, peaceably. They had not only the historical, constitutional right to do this, as every real student of constitutional history, South and North, now admits; they had, further, let us here repeat, the general assertion of the Declaration of Independence, governing all like cases, to support them. As pointed out by President Davis, in the above quotation from his inaugural, a prime object in establishing the Constitution of the United States and the federative government thereunder, was to "insure domestic tranquillity." The existing form of government under this Constitution having "become destructive of this end," so far as concerned the Southern States, the peoples of these States now moved to peaceably alter the form of government.

And, seldom remembered though it be now, there were at that time many in the North who believed that these Southern peoples had the inalienable right thus peaceably to withdraw. For instance, the New York Tribune itself, organ though it was of the aggressive anti-Southern party of that time, declared in November and December, 1860, after Lincoln's election, as follows:

"We hold with Jefferson to the inalienable right of communities to alter or abolish forms of government that have become oppressive or injurious, and if the cotton States shall become satisfied that they can do better out of the union than in it, we insist on letting them go in peace. The right to secede may be a revolutionary one, but it exists nevertheless, and we do not see how one party can have a right to do what another party has the right to prevent. Whenever a considerable section of our union shall deliberately decide to go out, we shall resist all coercive measures designed to keep it in. We hope never to live in a republic whereof one section is pinned to the residue by bayonets. * * * If ever seven or eight States send agents to Washington to say, 'We want to go out of the union,' we shall feel constrained by our devotion to human liberty to say, 'Let them go!' And we do not see how we could take the other side without coming in direct conflict with those rights of man which we hold paramount to all political arrangements, however convenient and advantageous."

SOVEREIGNTY AND TREASON

Not such men as revolutions generally bring to the front, said Stephens, of the Confederate leaders. True. For be it remembered that these men represented, officially represented, long existent and independent republics already fully organized. The formation of a league or confederacy between these republics was but an incident, an arrangement of convenience, as pointed out by Mr. Davis in his inaugural address. How, then, could States, republics, independent nations, be said to revolt or rebel? A people or a faction rebels against a superior; not against an equal or an inferior. Therefore a creator State of inherently sovereign powers could not possibly rebel against either the creature central government of strictly limited and delegated powers, or against coequal, confederate States. This being so, and Southern individuals acting only as citizens of their respective States, there could be no treason in their conduct.

Why was Jefferson Davis, although long held a prisoner after the war, never brought to trial on the charge of high treason for which he was indicted? It is said (though I am not at this time prepared to vouch for the accuracy of the report) that a solemn warning was sounded forth from the Supreme Court of the United States to the effect that to push such a charge against our fallen leader would be to fool with a combination boomerang and back-action buzz saw. Be that as it may, we know that Mr. Davis, after long imprisonment, was released on bail (Horace Greeley himself being a bondsman), and the indictment was never tried.

AHEAD OF THE TIMES

Yes; the course of the southern peoples was the only course consistent with peace and honor. Alas! they were ahead of their times; and, like all those who in any age or clime dare to be ahead of their day and generation, they have been made to suffer for their temerity. As Charles Mackay, the poet, says:

"That man is thought a knave or fool
Or bigot plotting crime,
Who, for the advancement of his race,
Is wiser than his time."

Civilization takes but one step forward at a time, then pauses and rests before the next step. The southern people of the period of 1789–1861, in the very vanguard of this slowly advancing civilization, acted on the same principle that the same rule should govern in the intercourse between nations and peoples as between individuals, and that rule the golden rule. But they were wiser than their time. Let me explain:

Some three centuries before this the civilized, Christian (?) nations of Europe saw nothing wrong in kidnaping the defenseless heathens of Africa sands and selling them into bondage far from their native haunts. They justified such practice on the grounds alike of expediency and morals. It would bring the heathen under the benign influences of Christianity, and at the same time cause wealth to flow into the ready pockets of their benignant captors. So the oversea slave trade went merrily on for the space of several hundreds of years. Then laggard civilization took a step forward and said that this was all wrong. The African trade, or the theft and forcible importation of negroes, was abolished, and the Southern States took a hand with the rest in abolishing it. Meantime civilization was preparing to take another step forward—to supplement the cessation of slave importation with the abolition of slavery itself. Owing to local causes some communities were more forward in this movement than were others. The situation in the Southern States was thus sensed by Jefferson: "The cession of that kind of property [slaves], for so it is misnamed, is a bagatelle which would not cost me a second thought if in that way a general emancipation and expatriation could be effected; and gradually, with due sacrifice, I think it might be, but as it is we have the wolf by the ears and we can neither hold him nor safely let him go. Justice is in the one scale and self-preservation in the other." Too, it should be added, slavery remained profitable in the South longer than in some other communities, and southerners were but human. But the reform was moving forward everywhere, and was bound to triumph in the end. It ought to have been allowed to triumph peaceably. Out of the differences in local conditions, in this and in other matters, arose the fierce controversies between the Southern and the Northern States of the American Union.

When the contention had waxed so hot that peaceful union was no longer possible, then the Southern States proposed a peaceable separation. The North said, "No; we will force you back." The South said, "No; that is all wrong." The Declaration of Independence, the letter and the spirit of the Constitution, advancing civilization itself, all proclaim in trumpet tones that it is just as wrong for one nation, state, or group of states to conquer another vi et armis and to force upon it a government it does not desire as it is for one man to steal another man and sell him into bondage, or for a nation now (as was formerly done) to deny to its citizens the right of voluntary expatriation.

So spoke the South, wiser than her time. The North, not so wise, essayed to enslave whole States and peoples. For this is what a forcible union of one-time sovereign States means.

It is not within the scope of this address to follow the course of that memorable struggle. From the day of Thermopylæ down, to battle for home and native land against the invader and the despoiler has ever called forth the utmost valor and exertion of patriots. The southern soldiery came of an adventurous, frontier stock. Southrons generally could ride and shoot; and this war they fought to repel the invader. The result was the Confederate warrior, since that time the synonym for all that is best and bravest in war. The fame of the Confederate soldier is deathless; his glory as eternal as the stars. Starvation, not numbers, overwhelmed him after four years of heroic endurance and brilliant feats of arms. The crucial banner of the South sank without a stain upon it, save only the lifeblood of thousands of its martyr defenders.

"THE UNION" UNSAVABLE

In this course of invasion and conquest, in which she was finally successful, did the North, let me ask, really "save the Union," as she professed to do? No; she did not—from the very nature of the thing, she could not. The Union of the fathers, of the Constitution of 1787–1789, was a Union of choice, of peace. That original Union was and is forever gone as between the South and the North. It was ipso facto destroyed by the withdrawal from it of the Southern States. And, like Humpty Dumpty when he fell from the wall, or like the late Mr. Morgan's scrambled eggs, all the king's horses and all the king's men could never (forcibly) put it together again. A Union, indeed, a new, diverse, blood-red Union of force was created and pinned together by bayonets; the Union was not and could not be saved, though it might be restored by the free consent once more of all the parties to the original Union.

And further, the success of the Southern Confederacy would not have meant the destruction of the American Union. By the victory of the revolted Colonies in 1776–1783 the immemorial union of English-speaking peoples was severed; but only as to these Colonies; the rest of the English-speaking union, known as the British Empire, continues to live, and to live truly stronger and better from the lesson that was well learned when one part of that union was lost through the blunders of sectional aggression.

Not for one moment do I question the honesty and patriotism of the brave soldiers in blue, who, I cheerfully admit, sincerely believed that they were fighting for the Union of the fathers, although many of them allowed themselves to be swept along into this belief. But I do say this, that they, as well as we, were victims of their own juggernaut; that their plea for a forcible American Union was of the same essence with the plea in 1776, for a forcible British union; it was the plea of Old World and world-old imperialism, and a plea which will justify every war of invasion and conquest that has ever stained history's pages.

WHAT MIGHT (AND SHOULD) HAVE BEEN

But the objection is sometimes made that the South's success would have meant the Latin-Americanization of the Southern States; that the principle of peaceable secession once established, all union between the different States would have been no more than a rope of sand, and we would speedily have degenerated into a parcel of petty, mutually jealous republics—perhaps dictatorships. The history of our race refutes the suggestion.

For some two thousand years the Anglo-Saxon and the Celt have wrought out, link by link, on the anvil of hard experience and dogged experimentation the everlasting principles of self-government. The success of the Confederate States of America would have turned out another and a stronger link, would have marked another glorious step forward in the laborious progress of liberty and self-government. Ours is a patient race, no less than a progressing one, and the successful termination of our second War for Independence could never have changed that bent of mind and habit of action that stand behind the following assertion in the Declaration of Independence:

"Prudence, indeed, will dictate that governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and, accordingly, all experience hath shown that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed."

After the triumph of our first war of secession more than three-quarters of a century passed, during which this right of secession, as now reinforced by constitutional provisions, was often asserted before it was actually resorted to. There is no reason to think that a second successful application of this drastic remedy, and under a like strong provocation, would have cut us adrift from our previous caution and long-suffering.

Again, it is argued that there would have been constant causes for friction and even bloodshed arising between the Confederate States of America and their neighbors to the north, the United States of America. Well, would that sort of bloodshed have been any bloodier than the four years of it that was suffered in imposing the Union's yoke upon the Southern States? But, after all, are we so sure that those two powers, once they had started together in the pathway of peace, would have been unable to continue side by side in amity? Despite strong provocation at times we manage, nearly all of the time, to preserve the peace even with storm-rocked Mexico. And we are about to celebrate a century of peace with those ancient enemies of ours, now our British and Canadian friends, although during the whole of that period they have formed our entire northern land boundary, and although "another Mississippi" (the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence) flows from our territory through theirs to the sea.

Another objection, or theory: That, after all, it is better for the South that the war should have ended as it did. No, a thousand times no: First and foremost, because evil should never be done that good may come of it and because Appomattox put back a half-century or more the hand of progress on the dial plate of civilization; second and secondarily, because the history of the 50 years succeeding the war is a record of legislation hostile to the material interests of the Southern portion of what is called a reunited country. Under the first of these two heads we may add, that not only was progress thus retarded, but that a new and dangerous element has been introduced into the body politic—the spirit of evasion of the fundamental law. If you doubt it, see how certain provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution have become practically a dead letter, and by well-nigh universal consent. This fourteenth amendment is one of the "war amendments," as they are called.

FATE AND THE CONFEDERACY

But fate, we hear it said, had decreed the downfall of the Southern Confederacy. The very stars in their courses, we are told, fought against the South, even as they fought against Sisera of yore. That assertion I shall not here stop to dispute, beyond remarking that the final outcome of the war was extremely doubtful until within less than eight months of General Lee's surrender—probably so, that is, until Atlanta fell a few weeks before the date of the presidential election of 1864 in the United States. But—what is meant by "the stars in their courses"?

Come with me, on a clear, moonless night, and scan that part of the heavens that encircles the pole star and in which the entire course of a given star is above the horizon. Watch with me some bright stellar sun which, having left the zenith, gradually descends the western sky, appears to stand still a while at the extreme westernmost point, then swings slowly but surely eastward again on the return sweep around the pole, yet still descending until it reaches the nadir, whence it gradually ascends again as it swings ever on toward the east. Other stars, farther south, not thus visible throughout their entire orbits, appear to the eye of the observer to set, and are blotted out of sight a long while before they rise again.

Yes, the stars indeed march resistlessly on in their courses; but those courses are in circles.

THE CONFEDERATE DAY-STAR

There are signs in the political heavens that Dixie's guiding star, her glorious constellation the Southern Cross of battle, which set blood red at Appomattox, is now appearing in the east, a pure, glistening white, the day-star of hope and happiness for the Southland and for the world.

To explain, and to drop the figure. Certain great world tendencies in the forward march of civilized mankind are found in diverse yet complementary pairs; first one, then the other, predominating in alternate pulsating cycles. Broadly speaking, the nineteenth century was an era of the predominance of the centripetal power in government, the ascendancy of the central political authority. The triumph of militant French democracy in the revolution of 1789 quickly merged into the imperial despotism of Napoleon, the erstwhile republican conqueror; this was succeeded by the return of the Bourbons to power. Just at this time our Latin neighbors to the south, not yet schooled for true liberty, broke away from enervated Spain; but we must remember that it was only the joining of hands of the United States and Britain, and the resultant raising of that shield of the western world, the Monroe doctrine, that checked the reactionist "Holy Alliance" of continental Europe in its project of forcible recovery of these revolted Spanish colonies—so, at least, it is supposed. The second French Republic, born out of due time in the abortive convulsions of 1848, was speedily swallowed up by the second Empire, which eventually gave place to the third (and semimonarchical) Republic. The great revolutionary upheavals of 1848 throughout Europe were generally suppressed. Within the next few years Kossuth and the cause of Hungarian independence went down before the imperial Hapsburgs; Poland in vain sought to regain her lost nationality; the former independent or autonomous principalities and electorates of Germany became welded into the modern German Empire with the ruthless Bismarck at the helm.

In the face of this ominous reaction in the Old World, the glorious ensign of confederated southern independence was raised aloft in our own stormy sky. The dragon teeth of overweening, un-American imperialism sown by Webster 30 years before bore their rich harvest of armed cohorts from the North, and the southern Confederacy, latest and most promising of freedom's growing family of happy nations, was swept from the face of the earth. And, significantly enough, in the midst of our struggle for independence it was the fleet of autocratic Russia, inveterate foe to liberty, that wintered in New York Harbor to lend moral support to the cause of northern aggression and conquest as against the threatened aid of more enlightened England to the cause of the South—England, always a well-wisher of a weaker people fighting for freedom, except only when she herself happens to be the oppressor—England, who at a later time crushed down the liberty-loving Boers in a war in many particulars most strikingly like the war on the Confederacy.

But now, thank God, the trend amongst progressive and, at heart, liberty-loving peoples is once more away from imperialism and forcible union. For, under imperialism and forcible union, there is no adequate protection for a sectional minority; remember that. Imperialism and forcible union are in their workings robbery of the right of local self-government, which is the alpha and omega of political liberty. From about the close of the nineteenth century on, what do we see? The waning of the centripetal force in government, the waxing of the centrifugal. In the world-old strife between liberty and power, liberty begins again to prevail in the renewed recognition of the saving principle of home rule and the rights of the minority.

We ourselves in 1898 helped Cuba in her stand for freedom. Five years later we aided and abetted Panama in her secession from the United States—of Colombia. We thereby officially and governmentally recognized (whether with due regard to our duty toward Colombia we need not here inquire), solemnly recognized, that the interests and desires of the whole are not always paramount to the rights of a part; yea, even though the territorial integrity of the United States—of Colombia—was thereby sacrificed. Shortly thereafter we see Norway resolutely sunder the bonds of union with her homogeneous sister, Sweden. And the wayward, weaker sister (with about the same proportion of area and population of the whole Scandinavian union as the South had of the whole American Union) is in this instance allowed to go in peace, just as certain in the North were fair enough and brave enough to advocate, but vainly, be done with us in 1861. And later still we see something like secession from secession in the case of Ulster and Ireland.

Even in the matter of amending the Federal Constitution, behold Senator La Follette's "gateway amendment" by which a minority is empowered to propose amendments. A similar provision was made 50 years before in the constitution of the Confederate States of America; a most decided improvement in favor of the rights of the minority over the cumbersome and reactionary provision of the Federal Constitution requiring a two-thirds majority even to propose amendment for consideration by the amending power.

These, I submit, are no fanciful comparisons, no imaginary parallels. No matter what may be all the details, all the motives, in each case, on the whole we may confidently affirm that through it all runs a larger sense than before of the rights of the weaker; of the beauties and blessings of peace; of the folly, and worse, of war. The Hague tribunal and the Bryan peace treaties are further witnesses to this auspicious change. To come nearer home, an acquaintance of mine, a gentleman from California, remarked casually, in the course of a conversation with me, that among the people of the Pacific coast there was quite a good deal of talk to the effect that they have their own interests and are quite capable of maintaining a separate political existence; although, he added, there is among them, too, a strong attachment to the Union. Just how these two things are reconciled, or to be reconciled, he did not say. And (another coincidence) much of the differences, if such we may style them, between the Pacific States and the East, like the former controversies between South and North, arise from a race question growing out of the presence in their midst of an alien, dark-skinned race.

OUR PAST EXEMPLARS OUR FUTURE GUIDES

So we see the tardily turning tide of national and international ideals and tendencies at last following the once overwhelmed, never really lost, current of Confederate principles. And the South, the ever faithful South, of later times we find revering her leaders of the earlier and darker periods, for "there is life in the old land yet."

We find the South, near half a century after Appomattox, risen phœnix-like from the ashes of war and reconstruction and pushing forward in all fields of endeavor. Agriculture, commerce, manufactures, education, literature, good roads, adjustment of her race problem without undue outside interference (hence, as more of a sociological, less of a partisan, sectional question)—in all these the peoples of the Southern States were making splendid progress and were rapidly recovering the lost ground in political leadership. But, in the midst of all this it was that, by separate but similar acts, three Southern States, for themselves and for the South at large, linked the present with the past for the future in a way most significant.

In the first decade of the twentieth century the South placed among the officially designated immortals of the several United States in Statuary Hall at the Capitol Building in Washington city the effigies of John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina, and Robert E. Lee, of Virginia; and on the sterling plate service of the battleship Mississippi the likeness of Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi and Kentucky. There they remained, fitly typifying the South's own contribution to the cause of true liberty as against overweening power, her chosen champions of the two phases of constitutional home rule through State sovereignty, viz: Nullification or State veto subject to Federal referendum, and secession or resumption of full powers by the State; and only when these are scorned by her oppressors and all constitutional redress denied, then the stainless sword of defensive war (f).

Calhoun, Davis, Lee—men with private lives as spotless as their political principles are true, exemplars of the Southland's past, guides for her future.

Yes, our constellation was only obscured, it did not really set at Appomattox; the Southern Cross of minority rights, home rule, and arbitration once more flames in the morning sky, and it shall shine more and more unto the perfect day, if the South—America—the world is to have true progress with peace.

COL. CARL L. ESTES—OUACHITA NATIONAL PARK

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I have a letter from the Governor of the Commonwealth of Texas, and letters from all the ministers of Tyler, Tex., from the presidents of the banks of Tyler, Tex., and from the chamber of commerce of that city, all bearing testimony to the high character and strict integrity of Colonel Estes, whom the Secretary of the Interior so grossly insulted. After reading the letter of the governor I wish to place all of the other letters in the RECORD. The governor's letter is addressed to me and reads as follows:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Austin, Tex., April 3, 1928.

Hon. T. H. CARAWAY,
Member of United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am grateful that you came to the defense of my personal friend Carl L. Estes, of Tyler, Tex., in connection with the incident which occurred in the office of Secretary Work.

After reading the letter which the Secretary addressed to Senator PHIPPS and the statement prepared by Mr. Estes, I can not wonder that Mr. Estes resented this treatment or that Mr. Work felt the necessity of a letter of explanation.

Those of us who know Carl Estes have every confidence in his truthfulness, integrity, and sterling character. Your prompt defense of him is typical of the loyalty and confidence which his friends receive from him and to which he is entitled.

Yours very truly,

DAN MOODY.

I have already had inserted in the RECORD the statement of Colonel Estes denying that the man from Georgia, who so miraculously showed up to be a witness for the Secretary, was not, in fact, present. I am confident from all that occurred that the Secretary knows that when that letter was written it was written by somebody who was not present, somebody who was telling a lie in his behalf, and that he was willing to avail himself of it.

I ask that the letters to which I have referred may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The letters are as follows:

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Tyler, Tex., April 2, 1928.

To whom this may concern:

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,

To: Senator CARAWAY, Arkansas; Gov. Dan Moody, Austin; the Associated Press, Dallas.

We, the undersigned bankers of Tyler, Tex., unhesitatingly state that Col. Carl L. Estes, newspaper man of this city, is a truthful, upright citizen of this town and that you can depend upon what he says as the absolute truth.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Tyler, Tex., April 2, 1928.

To whom it may concern:

I take great pleasure in stating that Col. Carl Estes, of Tyler, Tex., is well and favorably known to me.

There is not a shadow of a doubt as to his integrity or veracity. His moral character and deportment are above reproach.

Respectfully,

TYLER CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
E. P. MCKENNA, President.

SENATOR HEFLIN'S REPLY TO MAYOR GUNTER, OF MONTGOMERY, ALA.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from me to the mayor of Montgomery, Ala., regarding the presidential primary in our State, in which I discuss Governor Smith.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, leave is granted.

The letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 7, 1928.

Mayor WILLIAM A. GUNTER,
Montgomery, Ala.

MY DEAR MR. GUNTER: You must pardon me for not answering your telegram sooner. I have been so busy with my duties in the Senate that I have not had the time to write what I felt should be said in response to your challenge, but since Alabama friends have informed me of your attacks upon me recently when you were trying to please the Roman Catholic mayor of New York City, Mr. Walker—Al Smith's gold-dust twin—I have decided to bring at this time certain things to your attention and to the attention of the people that you are asking to send you as a delegate from the State at large to the Democratic National Convention.

So far as I can learn you have refused to tell the people of Alabama just how you stand on the candidacy of the most dangerous candidate for President to-day before the Democratic Party. No man should seek to obtain votes under false pretenses. At least four-fifths of the Democrats of Alabama are against Al Smith first, last, and all the time. Are you for him or against him?

When you joined with the Roman cohorts in denouncing me they knew that you spoke their language and that they could trust you.

As a Senator from the great State of Alabama I felt that it was my duty to do what I could to prevent war with Mexico, and I went to work doing everything in my power to prevent such a war. I found on investigation that those who were advocating war with Mexico and seeking to use the United States Army to overthrow the present Mexican Government were Roman Catholics. I exposed their un-American program and criticized their strange and inexcusable conduct. I led the fight which resulted in defeating their war program. Do you indorse or condemn the work that I did to prevent war with Mexico? Do you think that I did wrong in exposing in the Senate the efforts of the Roman Catholic Knights of Columbus and the efforts of a Mr. BOYLAN, a Roman Catholic Congressman from New York City (Al Smith's close friend), who introduced in Congress a resolution demanding that the United States immediately sever diplomatic relations with Mexico, which meant war?

I am the first man in either branch of Congress to bring that serious matter to the attention of the American people. Would you have had me refrain from doing that because those who wanted to involve us in war with Mexico were Roman Catholics? Miss Semple, a nun and Roman Catholic mother superior, a sister to your deceased brother-in-law, Darry Semple, appeared and testified in support of the Catholic program for war with Mexico.

After Miss Semple, nun and Catholic mother superior, and others had been here to urge Congress to support the Catholic program for war with Mexico, the New York World said editorially:

"If you don't want war with Mexico, write your Members of the House and Senate to oppose it. We are dangerously near to war with Mexico."

Was it not time for me and other Senators to get busy and oppose such a war?

Permit me to remind you that I have not forgotten the last war—the World War. It pained me to see our soldiers go away to fight on foreign soil. In that case we were not to blame. Then American rights, interests, and liberties were at stake and we had to fight; but in this instance it was purely and wholly a Roman Catholic question. I said that Congress had no right to involve the United States in war for the purpose of fighting the battles of the Roman Catholic Church in Mexico. Was I right or was I wrong?

When you attacked me on my work in the Senate on this question you put yourself on record as condemning my position, and as one who was in full sympathy with the Roman Catholic political program and their program for war with Mexico. I had attacked both. I never want to see another Alabama boy, or any other American boy, leave home and loved ones and go away from the United States to engage in war in foreign countries.

In the World War some of the bravest and finest boys in Alabama and other States lost their lives on the battle fields of France, and their loved ones still "long for the touch of a vanished hand and the sound of a voice that is still." War is a horrible thing. In its wake are broken hearts and ruined homes. "Its path is wet with human blood and paved with dead men's bones."

Do you think that I should have remained silent when Roman Catholics were trying to get the United States to go to war with Mexico in order to restore the Catholic Church to power there? I heard nothing from you then.

The Catholic-controlled press of the United States praises Mussolini, of Italy. The Fascist Society that he organized and used to close Protestant churches and deny religious freedom to Protestants and Jews in Italy, and to tear down Masonic lodges and murder Masons, is now organized and operating in the United States. They are undisturbed as they carry on their un-American activities in Governor Smith's home State, New York, and New York City.

Not long ago the Mussolini Roman Catholic Fascists in the United States held a convention at Philadelphia and they sent the following remarkable telegram to Mussolini in Rome:

"Central Fascisti, closing its second annual reunion, send expressions of true devotion to the Duce (Mussolini) and renews its oath of allegiance to do his will and to carry out his orders to the end."

Does not that look like another arm of Roman power reaching over into the United States? This, I repeat, is the order that destroyed free speech in Italy, denied Protestants and Jews the right to worship God in accordance with the dictates of their own conscience. The same order destroyed Masonic lodges and murdered Masons in Italy. Italian Catholic fascism is dangerous to American rights and liberties. It has been characterized as a branch of Mussolini's foreign army. The telegram sent to Mussolini supports that theory. Do you think that I am doing right in calling attention to the menacing presence of these dangerous un-American organizations?

You were not content with your reflection upon me, and your efforts to injure me in your telegram to Senator ROBINSON, who is condemned by thousands of Democrats in Arkansas, Alabama, and the other States, for his inspired attack upon me for exposing the Catholic conspiracy. You tried to lend dignity and force to your attack upon me by stating that you were speaking for a majority of the people of Alabama. What induced you to even imagine that you, in defending the Roman Catholic war program which would call for the killing of Alabama boys in Mexico, and trying to discredit and cripple me in my efforts to defeat their plan to involve the United States in war with Mexico in behalf of the Catholic church, were speaking for a majority of the people of Alabama? Did you think that I would not know of your family's Roman Catholic connecting link and your peculiarly intimate Roman Catholic environment?

You were not content, as mayor of the capital city of my State, with using your official position to attack, misrepresent, and slander me in your telegram to Senator ROBINSON, who seemed to have pleased you by his strange speech in opposition to my criticism of the un-American conduct and dangerous activities of the Roman Catholic political machine. You then sent a telegram to me—bold, arrogant, and in a Roman Catholic tone—challenging me to become a candidate for delegate against you from the State at large to the Democratic National Convention.

In your telegram you unfortunately used language the substance of which Catholic-controlled newspapers had frequently used in their attacks upon me for opposing their Mexican war program, to wit: That I was "trying to dynamite free speech and free religion out of the Constitution." And I want to remind you of another thing: Your attack upon me followed my denunciation in the Senate of your friend Al Smith. You hastened to get into the fray and have your say because of the truths that I was telling on your candidate for President.

When I was receiving letters from citizens all over Alabama and from every other State, commending me for the work that I did to prevent war with Mexico, I never had a line from you as mayor of Montgomery. You never thanked me for what I had done as a Senator from Alabama to prevent the killing of Alabama boys in a war with Mexico, but when I exposed the Hearst-Roman Catholic-Mexican conspiracy to injure me, an Alabama Senator, and destroy me if possible by dragging my name into a diabolical scandal, you joined with my enemies and with the enemies of your country and used the office of mayor of the capital of our State to injure and discredit me. When this thing happened I could not help thinking of the Roman Catholic family connection that I have referred to and also of the Jesuit priest brother of your brother-in-law.

ROMAN CATHOLIC ATTACK UPON MASONS

The Roman Catholic hierarchy has always fought the Masonic fraternity. A few years ago the New World, the official organ of the Roman Catholic bishops of the diocese of Chicago, contained an article which bitterly attacked and denounced the Masonic order. Among other mean things, it said: "As compared with Freemasonry, the 'Black Hand' Society of the Italian Mafia (cutthroats and murderers) is a praiseworthy organization." That statement is an insult to the name and fame of Washington, Father of his Country.

Here is what Washington, Master Mason, who led the Continental Army in achieving American liberty and was first President of the United States, said about the Freemasonry so bitterly attacked by the Roman Catholics of Chicago: "Freemasonry is a fraternity whose liberal principles are founded upon the immutable law of truth and justice, and whose grand obligation is to promote the happiness of the human race."

MASONRY OPPOSED BY MUSSOLINI

Doctor Fama, an able and loyal American, born in Italy, but now a Presbyterian minister in New York, in an article appearing recently in the New Age, the Masonic magazine published here in Washington, said:

"There is one body of men in Italy, strong in their bonds of freedom, whom Mussolini can not bribe and whose spirit he can not conquer or destroy. They are the Masons."

The unification of Italy was accomplished in 1870 by the forebears of these men. The petty tyrants ruling that land against the will of the people were subdued by the religion of freedom preached by the Masons. Freedom and democracy and brotherly love, and peace and equality were the result of the infusion of Masonic principles into the statesmanship practiced by Cavour, Mazzini, and Garibaldi.

Separation of church and state is recognized, even in England, as the basic principle of true liberty, and up to the time of Mussolini Masonry was the equalizing force in Italy between church and state. It was Masonry that emancipated the Roman Jew from the foul insult of the ghetto system. It was Masonry that enabled American, British, and other Protestants dwelling in Italy to absorb her art, to worship in freedom according to the dictates of their own conscience.

Italy's greatest men were Masons. Her army was commanded and kept efficient by members of the craft. The judges of her law courts, the professors of her universities, numbered among them Masons by the scores. These men taught the Masonic principles of loyalty, love, liberty, and hatred of tyranny. In this fact Mussolini found his greatest obstacle to absolutism.

Masonry declined to allow the destruction of the second Italian renaissance. Masonry declined to be bribed. Mussolini ordered the lodges destroyed. The Masonic temple in Rome was appropriated to his own use. The furniture and records of Masonic lodges in Italy were burned in public squares. Edicts were issued ordering the discharge from the public service of those employed therein who had any connection with Masonry.

In October, 1924—the records are clear and unimpeachable—blackshirts entered the homes of recalcitrant Masons in Florence and murdered them before the horrified eyes of their families. Stores in the larger cities of Italy owned by Masons are fitting prey for blackshirt brigands. They are frequently looted and destroyed.

A vice consul of the United States was cudgeled, it was reported, for failing to raise his hat to a group of marching Mussolini blackshirts. A medical friend of mine (Italian), living in New York, when paying a professional visit to Naples was thrown into a cell and held two days until the American ambassador warned Mussolini to release him. The reason given was that he was a Mason who had acquired American citizenship. The questor, or jailer, told this citizen of this country that if he had his way the physician would rot in jail.

Mussolini is the state: Preach liberty, and you go to jail, or are murdered! "I," declaimed Mussolini in one of his public utterances to his blackshirts, "will destroy Masonry in Italy, and when I have finished here I will do my utmost to destroy the pest abroad."

Orders were issued to all consular offices to discharge any and all employees in any way affiliated with the order. The former Italian consul general in New York was recalled because he was a Mason. One of his employees for 20 years was dismissed.

Is not that a terrible indictment against Roman Catholic cruelty and tyranny and Catholic Fascist murder?

The Masonic fraternity is a whole-hearted, thoroughly loyal American institution. It has been foremost of all the old fraternal orders in its efforts to promote and preserve the public-school system of America. It has stood with drawn sword at all times on the dividing line twixt church and state, and in season and out has urged the necessity of protecting the United States against an influx of undesirable foreigners. That is why the hierarchy and Roman Catholic political machine hate the Masons of America.

The late Doctor McDaniel, of Richmond, Va., who was president of the Southern Baptist Convention in 1926, said: "The United States is the country most coveted by the Pope. If the Pope and Roman Catholics had the power in the United States that they have in Italy, would they be as intolerant here as they are there? Judged by every historical precedent, they would."

Just a few months ago, right here in Washington, Bishop Cannon quoted from a Catholic book called "State and Church," published right recently by Doctor Ryan, a Catholic professor of moral theology at the Catholic University of America. He is looking forward to and writing about the day when Catholics are strong enough to assert themselves and control this country. In his book he tells the Catholics just what can be done to enable them to be masters of the situation. Here is the proof. Read what he says:

"But constitutions can be changed, and non-Catholic sects may decline to such a point that the political proscription of them may become feasible and expedient.

"What protection would they then have against the Catholic state?

"The latter could logically tolerate only such religious activities as were confined to the members of the dissenting group. It could not permit them to carry on the general propaganda."

God forbid that they shall ever have the power in the United States to smother Protestantism and set up Catholicism in its place.

Senator Tom Watson, of Georgia, said: "Wherever Rome has ruled, she has left the people sunk in ignorance."

General La Fayette, of France, who fought with our forefathers for American liberty, said: "If America ever loses her liberty it will be through the work of priests and nuns."

Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence and father of the Democratic Party, declared that "without exception every priest-ridden country had lost its liberty."

He that hath eyes to see, let him see; and he that hath ears to hear, let him hear.

In 1916 the Roman Catholic hierarchy and political machine tried to get President Wilson to go to war with Mexico and when he failed and refused to do their bidding, the Roman Catholics voted against him for reelection and did everything in their power to defeat him. The Al Smith bunch bolted the National Democratic ticket and voted with the Republicans in order to punish and if possible to defeat Wilson because he refused to take the United States Army to Mexico to fight for the Pope of Rome.

What would your friend Al Smith do if he had the power, if the head of the Roman government, the Pope, should demand that the Catholic Church be restored to power in Mexico? As President, he would be Commander in Chief of the United States Army and Navy and would have control of both. Would you want to turn this power over to him at a time when Roman Catholics are demanding the overthrow of the present Mexican Government and the reestablishment of the old Catholic government? Have you no more concern for the peace, happiness, and lives of our boys than that? They used their power as voters in the United States to punish President Wilson for refusing to use the United States Army to restore the Catholic Church to power in Mexico. Which government were they serving then—the Roman government or the American Government? "By their fruits ye shall know them."

Doctor McDaniel and Bishop Cannon were right—where the Roman Catholic vote is strong and in the majority, Catholic leaders are bold, arrogant, intolerant, and vindictive. The rule or ruin spirit manifests itself. When I exposed in the Senate the Hearst-Catholic-Mexican conspiracy to punish, and, if possible, to destroy me for successfully opposing the Roman Catholic program for war with Mexico, the Roman Catholic chairman of the Democratic Club of Boston, Al Smith's friend, wired Senator ROBINSON demanding that I be read out of the Democratic Party. Why? Simply because I had dared to denounce the dangerous activities of the Roman Catholic political machine, which shows that they put that Catholic machine above the welfare of the party and the good of the country.

Talk about "intolerance," there it is in a mean and contemptible form. They would have a United States Senator read out of his party for exercising his right of free speech in telling the truth in the Senate.

But that isn't all they did. Thirteen Roman Catholic members of the Legislature of Massachusetts, friends of your friend Al Smith, wired the governor of my State, Governor Graves, to call the legislature in extra session and have it read me out of the Democratic Party. Did you ever hear of such an ignorant and asininical request? Do you want to turn this Government and all that it means to us over to such an intolerant, brutal, and bigoted group in our midst, whose leaders boast that as soon as they are strong enough they will control this country, and that when that time comes no Member of Congress, in House or Senate, will be elected unless the Pope indorses him? All true Americans must and they will fight against the coming of that day.

Do you want those who are seeking to use the Democratic Party as an instrument to carry out the program of the Roman Catholic political machine to take control of and direct the leadership of the great American party of Jefferson? I, like hundreds of thousands of others, am not willing for them to use the Democratic Party as a tail to the Roman Catholic kite; and they are not going to do it if I can prevent it.

IMMIGRATION—THE RIGHT TO RESTRICT IMMIGRATION BELONGS TO EVERY TRUE AMERICAN

True to the principles and traditions of Tammany, Governor Smith is the bitter enemy of restricted immigration. Tammany Members of Congress, in season and out, have voted solidly against every attempt to protect the people of the United States from a deluge of undesirable foreigners whose European habits of thinking and living constituted a menace and danger to American ideals and institutions.

There are two ways of taking possession of a country and changing its policies and principles. One is by subduing it with an army, and the other is by constantly pouring into it large numbers of a certain group of foreigners until those who seek to control have the number necessary to effect the change and control desired.

Some months ago the Washington Post charged editorially that the immigration law was being violated and thousand and hundreds of thousands of foreigners were being smuggled into the United States every year. It is common knowledge that New York, the home city and State of Governor Smith, is one of the most notorious offenders in this regard.

If Governor Smith should be elected President, he would have it in his power to name the Immigration Commissioner and every immigration agent and guard at the gates of our country, and the whole matter of letting foreigners into the United States would be left to the will and pleasure of those named by Governor Smith to administer our immigration laws. Governor Smith and his followers are all opposed to restricted immigration. They want the doors left open so as to be able to bring in millions of Roman Catholics from foreign countries. Are you willing to place in their hands the power to do that?

MEXICO AND WAR

Quite a number of Governor Smith's friends and followers have tried to involve the United States in war with Mexico. The friends and followers of Governor Smith are just as anxious for intervention in Mexico now as they were when I helped to defeat their war program in the Senate.

Several newspapers have called on Governor Smith to know specifically what his position was on this Mexican question, but the governor would not tell them. I called on him in a speech in the Senate to tell how he stood on this very serious question. But Governor Smith has failed and refused to say. Why did, and why does, he keep his position hid from the American people? Is this a secret between the governor and his friends?

If Governor Smith should be elected President, he would appoint the Ambassador to Mexico, he would appoint the Secretary of State, and these two officials would in the main represent our Government on the Mexican question, and the Mexican position and policy of the United States would then be in the hands of Governor Smith and his friends. Did you know that over half of the employees of the State Department here at Washington are Roman Catholics?

Tammany, as a political organization, has a very unsavory reputation. It has been connected with some of the worst political scandals ever brought to public attention in the United States. The two last Democratic Presidents—Grover Cleveland and Woodrow Wilson—both denounced and repudiated Tammany. Governor Smith is a member of the Tammany organization. He is familiar with its history and is in thorough sympathy with its conduct, ideals, and ambitions. His record as a Tammany member of the New York Legislature and as governor of the State was one of sympathy and friendship for the barrooms and whisky traffic.

In addition to being a Tammanyite, he is the arch enemy of legalized prohibition in the United States, and as Governor of the State of New York is the most colossal stumbling block to prohibition law enforcement of all the governors of the 48 States. As governor he favored and approved an act of the Legislature of New York which in effect withdrew New York State from the Union, so far as the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution is concerned. By that act he said in effect, "We have no sympathy with and no respect or support for that part of the Constitution of the United States known as the eighteenth amendment."

Why did you as mayor of Montgomery, the capital city of Alabama, remain silent during the time that my Roman Catholic enemies were seeking to besmirch my name and endeavoring, through falsehood and corruption, to slander me as a Senator from Alabama? When the Senate committee which investigated the Hearst-Catholic-Mexican "frame-up" against me unanimously reported in my favor, declaring that there was no truth whatever in the "frame-up" charges of the Hearst-Catholic-Mexican conspirators—why didn't you, as the head official of the capital city of my State, wire me that you were glad that these crooks and criminals had failed in their infamous purpose to blacken the name of an Alabama Senator?

When the hearings on the Hearst-Catholic-Mexican scandal before the Senate committee disclosed that Avilla, a Mexican Catholic, from whom Hearst admitted he got the forged papers which dragged the names of Senator BORAH, Senator NORRIS, Senator LA FOLLETTE, and myself into a miserable scandal for the purpose of injuring us politically in our States and throughout the country; and that Avilla swore he got the forged papers from Catholic clerks of the Mexican Government, and that he told them he wanted the papers for Bishop Diaz, a Roman Catholic bishop, I never heard a word of condemnation from you of these villainous character assassins who had conspired together to injure and destroy, if possible, an Alabama Senator; you didn't send any telegrams then, but when I denounced those who had fraudulently and corruptly "framed" me in order to punish me for exposing, opposing, and helping to defeat the Roman Catholic program for war with Mexico, then it was that you broke your silence and took your stand on the side of those who hated and wanted to destroy me because I had dared to oppose the Pope's Mexican war program. Then it was that you sent abusive and insulting telegrams to Washington, signing your name as mayor of Montgomery for the purpose of injuring me and aiding those who, through falsehood and slander, were seeking to destroy me because I had been most successful in my efforts to defeat their plan for war with Mexico.

From your recent attempts to serve the "Roman Catholic hierarchy," I take it that you understand and are in sympathy with the Roman Catholic plan and purpose in the United States.

I have already shown you that they tried to use the United States Army to fight their religious battles in Mexico. Were they putting this Government first then, or were they putting Rome first? Doctor Tull, a great Baptist preacher of Arkansas, tells us that Cardinal Gibbons, a notable American Catholic, declared that "It is a marvelous fact worthy of record that in the whole history of the Catholic Church no solitary example can be adduced to show that any Pope ever revoked a decree enacted by any preceding Pope." That means that the doctrines and decrees laid down by any one of the Popes are indorsed and adhered to by all the other Popes.

Well, Pope Pius IX denounced religious freedom and declared "that the state had no right to leave the citizen to have the religion of his or her choice." That doctrine antagonizes every principle of religious freedom in the United States.

But that isn't all that he said on that subject. He said "The Roman Catholic Church has the right to require that the Roman Catholic religion shall be the only religion of the state, to the exclusion of all others." And, according to the late Cardinal Gibbons, of Baltimore, that pronouncement or edict stands as the unchangeable and eternal doctrine of all the Popes.

Well, the Popes have all held that the will of the Pope is the supreme law of all lands, and also that the supreme duty of all Catholics is to do the will of the Pope. Then the will of the Pope is above the law of the land, and their first duty is to do what the Pope wants done. Are you willing to give control over the American Government to a group of people who believe in such doctrines?

The Roman Catholic Tablet tells us that the "Roman Catholic citizens of the United States owe no allegiance to any principles of the Government which are condemned by the Pope." Are they putting the Roman Catholic government above the American Government?

Pope Leo XIII said: "All Catholics should exert their power to cause the constitutions of their state to be modeled to the principles of their church." Can that be construed to mean anything else but that the doctrines of the Catholic Church are to be substituted for the principles of the American Government? Is it their purpose to capture and control this Government?

Nearly 20 years ago the Roman Catholic Missionary declared that "Many non-Catholics fear us as a political organization and are afraid that the Catholic Church will dominate and rule. We are working quietly, seriously, and I may say effectively to that end."

Doctor Brownson, a noted Catholic writer, says: "Undoubtedly it is the intention of the Pope to possess this country. In this intention he is aided by the Jesuits and all the prelates and priests."

And the Catholic World tells us that "The moment is ripe for building a Catholic America, and the strong men are now laying the foundations." Do you want to assist in such a work by putting your friend Al Smith in the White House?

Dr. John Jay Chapman, a learned and noted citizen of Massachusetts, says that the slogan of the Knights of Columbus is: "Make America Catholic."

On September 10, 1924, an Associated Press dispatch from Rome appeared in the Boston papers which stated that the Pope had said that "it was not only his right, but his duty, to advise Catholics how to vote."

Then, if, as the Popes claim, it is the supreme duty of all Catholics to do the will of the Pope, the Catholics of the United States must vote as the Pope, this foreign power and potentate, tells them to vote.

Indeed the Catholic Review has long since taken the stand in the United States that "when a Catholic candidate" is on the ticket it is the duty of Catholics to vote for him.

In spite of this Government's strong and righteous position on the "separation of church and State," the Catholic parochial schools in this country teach Catholic children that that principle is wrong and the Catholic principle of the "union of church and state" is right. Why do they do that? Is this a part of the secret program to change the form of the United States Government and "make America Catholic"?

Did you know that in certain places in the United States, where the Roman Catholics outnumbered the Protestants and Jews, they denied these two latter groups the right guaranteed to every American to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience? Dr. Richard Henry Dana tells us that at one time in Los Angeles, Calif., the city council, under Catholic control, passed the following ordinance:

"The Roman Catholic apostolic religion shall prevail throughout this jurisdiction, and any person publicly professing another religion shall be prosecuted."

That has been done in every country where the Roman Catholics have had the power to do it. Do you want to see that history repeat itself here, as Doctor Ryan predicts it will do some day?

Did you know that while Al Smith has been elected Governor of New York State four times he has never carried but 4 counties of the 63 counties in the State, and that the 4 counties he carried are the big Catholic counties? The other 59 counties in the State, everyone of them, have gone against him every time he has been a candidate for governor. Only the four city counties controlled by the Catholic vote have gone for him, and now by assembling Catholics in large numbers in the four New York City counties and voting both Catholic men and women they have become strong enough to overcome the vote of the other 59 counties in the State.

Governor Smith, in four races for governor, could not carry a single one of the 59 counties where the American vote controls. In the States where the Catholics control the Democratic organization the Al Smith leaders, are having early presidential conventions and primaries for the purpose of influencing other States that will act later in the spring.

Did you know that Al Smith's Roman Catholic political machine betrayed the last Democratic nominee for President—John Davis—and cast the Catholic vote for the Republican candidate, Mr. Coolidge, for the purpose of having a "pull" on him to get him to go to war with Mexico? Did I do right in leading the fight to defeat their war program?

I will close by repeating what I said in the Senate: "I want all men and women to have the religion of their choice. I am not attacking the religion of the Catholic. I am fighting the insidious and dangerous activities of the Roman Catholic political machine—fighting their efforts to destroy the public-school system of America—fighting their efforts to flood this country with millions of undesirable foreigners. I am fighting their efforts to destroy free speech in and out of the Senate, free press, and the right of peaceful assembly, as they have done in Rome. No Alabama boy, and no other American boy, is going to be killed in Mexico fighting the battles of the Pope of Rome if I can help it. I repeat, I am willing for the Catholic to have his religion, but I am not willing for him to have the United States Army to fight his religious battles in foreign countries."

God help the Democrats of Alabama to see the importance of going to the polls in the primary on May 8 and voting for delegates who will vote against and work against the nomination of Al Smith.

Very truly,

J. THOMAS HEFLIN.

THE WORLD COURT

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I dare say a large number of Members of the Senate have been receiving letters, as I have been, with regard to what is known as the Gillett resolution for adherence to the World Court. I suppose I am receiving about a hundred letters a day urging support of the resolution, and most of them from people whose letters show that they do not understand the nature of the question. It occurred to me that it would be helpful to other Members of the Senate if I were to put into the RECORD a form letter which has been sent out broadcast through my State, and no doubt through the rest of the country, urging that citizens of our States should write to us to demand our support of that resolution.

The letter to which I refer has been sent me by several people in Pennsylvania who do not agree with the suggestion of the writer, and who sent it because they want us to know the source of the propaganda which is keeping our clerks so busy in acknowledging the communications. This letter comes from the American Foundation (Inc.) Maintaining the American Peace Award. It is dated 565 Fifth Avenue, New York City, March 27, 1928.

The letter is signed by Esther Everett Lape, member in charge, and it reads as follows:

DEAR MR. ———: Will you, and perhaps others in Clearfield who share your interest in international affairs, consider the advisability of expressing your opinion now on a critical aspect of the World Court matter, a question profoundly affecting our international relations?

Senator GILLETT has introduced in the Senate a resolution taking up the court matter again. If you have been interested in the court and in the attempt it represents to substitute international law for war, you must share the vast regret felt by thousands because the United States is still outside it.

It is now more than two years since the Senate, by a bipartisan vote of 76 to 17, passed a resolution providing for our entry into the court with certain reservations. It is a year and a half since the member nations of the court replied to these reservations, accepting most of them outright, expressing doubt as to the scope of one of them, and suggesting that a "further exchange of views" might clear up any remaining misunderstandings. To this courteous suggestion the United States has not replied.

The Gillett resolution aims at just one thing—to bring about this "further exchange of views." It would probably lead to agreement, for eminent jurists do not consider that the differences are fundamentally great. In any case, a regard for international courtesy demands that the United States make some reply to the last communication of the member nations of the court.

Leaders of both parties support the resolution. Its introducer, Mr. GILLETT, is a Republican member of the Foreign Relations Committee and a friend of the administration. He is supported in the matter by Mr. SWANSON, Democratic leader in the Foreign Relations Committee.

As a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, your Senator, Mr. REED, is in a position to influence early and favorable action on the Gillett resolution. Won't you write to him, and also to Senators GILLETT and SWANSON, expressing your hope that the resolution will certainly be passed this spring. Will you ask friends to write also or to join you in a group letter? And will you ask local organizations to forward resolutions of indorsement to the Senators named above? Please let us know any action you take.

Sincerely yours, ESTHER EVERETT LAPE,
Member in Charge.

Opinions from leading men and women of both parties are inclosed. If you need further copies of the resolution, please write.

Mr. President, that letter has been sent out in vast quantities throughout Pennsylvania. The well-intentioned people who have written to all of us urging us to support the so-called Gillett resolution are not told in this letter what the facts are. They do not understand those facts. I make no complaint of the appeal that they make to us to support the resolution, but I do think that it is worthy the attention of the Senate to notice the contrast between these propaganda letters and the actual facts.

The truth is, Mr. President, that up to the present time the adherence to the protocol of the World Court as voted by the Senate has been acquiesced in by only five nations, and they are Albania, Cuba, Greece, Liberia, and Luxemburg; while all the rest of the world remains in dissent.

Twenty-three nations have replied to the letter of the State Department setting forth the terms under which we will join the court, and each of the 23 find fault with reservation No. 5 in our resolution of adherence. Reservation No. 5, the Senate will remember, was—

That the court shall not render any advisory opinion except publicly after due notice to all States adhering to the court and to all interested States and after public hearing or opportunity for hearing given to any State concerned; nor shall it, without the consent of the United States, entertain any request for an advisory opinion touching any dispute or question in which the United States has or claims an interest.

Twenty-three nations have declined to accept that reservation. Either seven or eight nations—I think seven—have merely acknowledged receipt of the message from this country, saying that we would enter according to the reservations outlined by the Senate. Although it was sent to them nearly two years ago, we have had no communication from those seven nations save the bare acknowledgment of receipt of the message. Several nations, with even less courtesy, have not even acknowledged receipt.

There is the picture that confronts the administration and the Senate with regard to the World Court to-day.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I shall have finished in a moment, and then I shall be glad to answer questions.

The President has no power to vary to the extent of one comma the reservations as outlined by the Senate. The President could not negotiate with other countries in any way which was in conflict with the policy outlined by the Senate; and yet we know that with the exception of Albania, Cuba, Greece, Liberia, and Luxemburg the reservations of the Senate will not be acquiesced in.

It was very well said by the Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Castle, in a speech he made last January that when the pursuit of peace becomes a fad the cause of peace is injured. It can be nothing more than a fad, and a vain and futile and pernicious fad, to urge the President to conduct or to urge the citizens of the United States to think that the President could conduct negotiations that will resolve the impasse in which the World Court stands to-day. Any such gesture as that is a futile gesture and contributes nothing to the cause of world peace.

We are making great progress at this time toward the completion of treaties of arbitration with the great nations of the world. That represents a substantial movement in the cause of peace which will bring practical results, adding to the happiness and tranquillity of the world. This, however, is an empty gesture; and I sometimes resent the patronizing assumption that because the Senate does not instantly acquiesce in every such suggestion as this it is because the Senate and the Members of the Senate are desirous of war. Some of us know more by personal experience about the horrors of war than do the propagandists who write these letters; and it is fair to say that we detest and abhor war as much as they do, and with at least as good reasons, and that we are just as anxious as they to avoid a repetition of those horrors that we saw 10 years ago. To imply, however, that our unreadiness to vote for a gesture, which can only be an empty gesture, which can have no other effect than to create ill feeling instead of allaying it, evidences any lack of devotion to the cause of peace, is unfair to the Senate and untrue in fact.

I am glad to answer the Senator's questions, if he has any.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, does not the Senator think that either the executive department, through diplomatic channels, or the Senate itself, should explore the avenue which will lead to a proper interpretation or understanding of the words of reservation 5, quoted by the Senator, in which the World Court is interdicted from giving an advisory opinion in regard to any matter in which the United States has an interest or claims to have an interest?

It seems to me that that language is susceptible of misunderstanding. My recollection of the debates in the Senate is that there was no unanimity of opinion with respect to the proper interpretation to be placed upon those words. There was no clarifying declaration, so far as I now recall, that would enable Senators or the people of the world—the nations who have adhered to the protocol—to understand just what we meant when we said that we would not adhere to the World Court if any opinions were given as to matters in which we had an interest or claimed an interest.

I repeat, there was nothing stated that would indicate clearly what interpretation we placed upon those words. If we mean a real interest in the juridical sense, as lawyers use the word, then that is a very proper reservation. If it is a fantastic claim which we might assert to having an interest in some matter entirely foreign to the interests of the United States, and we joined the World Court upon the hypothesis that we could prevent the court from giving an opinion in regard to such a matter, then I am sure that those who are members of the court might well hesitate for a long time before they accepted our position and assented to the reservation which we made.

It does seem to me that the able Senator from Pennsylvania, great lawyer as he is, knowing the misinterpretation which the laity, if not real lawyers, would place upon the word "interest," claimed or otherwise, must appreciate the fact that the other signatories to the protocol might hesitate to accept our reservation with a lack of understanding as to the exact meaning to be placed upon those words. It does seem to me that the Senate ought to initiate some steps that will lead to a clarification of the meaning of those words. Let us declare that we mean a real interest as understood in a juridical sense. I am persuaded that if we would do that—if we would interpret the reservation which we have made in the proper way—the nations who are signatories to the protocol would welcome us into the World Court promptly.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senator's suggestion amounts to no more than that the United States should express to the other nations a statement that it will not claim a fantastic or imaginary interest, but will act only in good faith in any claims that it may set forth as to an interest in these moot questions. It seems to me that almost we would stultify ourselves if we were to couple our reservation with an assurance that we made it in good faith. I hope our sister nations are ready to grant that our reservations are made in good faith, and that we will carry through in good faith and will not claim imaginary or fantastic interests in bad faith.

I should not want to contract with a nation from whom I had to accept assurances that in the future they would exercise good faith. The very fact that we do contract with them is an expression of our belief in their good faith. Surely the United States does not need to do that.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, the piece of propaganda that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] has just called to the attention of the Senate is only a part of the vast flood of propaganda that is going through the mails to all the people in the United States.

I want to call the attention of the Senate again to the fact that it was very plainly brought out during the debate upon the resolution asking the United States to adhere to the protocol of signature to the instrument creating what was called the World Court of International Justice that questions leading to war are political in nature; and, therefore, will never be submitted to that court. That was admitted by some of the most able advocates of the proposition at the time.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I do.

Mr. FESS. In consonance with what the Senator says about the propaganda, at first it appeared to be confined to the churches. Later on it was extended to teachers, to colleges. This morning I have three letters from various chambers of commerce. This is the first definite evidence I have had that the propaganda now is extending to business organizations. Most of it is just in general form, and I doubt whether the people who adopt these expressions read them.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I doubt it. I thank the Senator for calling that to my attention.

Mr. President, I have nothing but the kindliest feelings for people anywhere in the world who earnestly and sincerely try to do away with war. I am one of them; but I resent very much the idea of people captalizing the desire of humanity for peace and using it to carry on a swindle upon the American people.

These propagandists would have us believe that all of Europe is anxious and ready for peace, but can not have it because the United States does not adhere to the World Court. These people tell things that are not true; as, for instance, that adherence to the court is necessary to the outlawry of war.

The propaganda that the so-called World Court of International Justice is an instrument for peace, it seems to me, is nothing but a swindle, because, as a matter of fact, it has nothing to do with the question of peace. The question of outlawing war has been brought very clearly to our attention within the last few months, when in answer to the request of the Government of the United States to join with us in asking the larger powers of the world to sign a multilateral treaty to outlaw war, France replied that she could not ask other nations to join in signing such a treaty, because of her obligations under the League of Nations and other treaties to go to war.

If these people who spend so much on propaganda will tell the American people the truth, they shall find no objection from me to their propaganda. The desire for peace is too sacred to be wasted on a lie.

In view of what has been said here this morning, Mr. President, I ask that an editorial in the Washington Post of Monday, April 2, covering this subject, may be read at the desk at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the editorial will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the Washington Post of Monday, April 2, 1928]

THE REFUSAL TO RENOUNCE WAR

Foreign Minister Briand's latest note in regard to Secretary Kellogg's proposal looking to the renunciation of war by the leading powers is a delightful example of old-style diplomacy, in which "no" is disguised under flattering language that seems to mean "yes."

American pacifists and amateur adjusters of world problems, who invariably think evil of their own Government and eagerly absorb foreign propaganda, are already hailing M. Briand's note as substantially accepting Mr. Kellogg's proposal. They think they see a treaty already in the making, by which all the great powers mutually agree to renounce war as between and among themselves. Therefore they resent the suggestion heretofore made that European powers are tied up in military alliances that forbid them from renouncing war. They do not perceive that M. Briand is caught in a net of his own weaving and is desperately trying to squirm away from his own proposal, made last spring for political purposes, and never intended to be made the basis for a genuine effort to abolish war.

M. Briand's note needs only a little analysis to be revealed as a defense of the existing military alliance system of Europe, under which France and other nations are unable to renounce war. They have bound themselves to utilize war as an instrument of policy. Mr. Kellogg's proposal strikes at the very heart of their military alliances. They can not accept his proposal. They do not wish to be exposed as hypocrites who profess to be anxious to disarm and to renounce war while actually increasing their armaments and making combines for waging war. Hence the elaborate embroidery of M. Briand's note. Strip it of its superfluous verbiage and its true intent is exposed.

Reduced to plain language, Mr. Briand's note states that France can not enter into an unconditional renunciation of war. If Mr. Kellogg insists upon such an agreement, "the French Government would hesitate to discuss longer the question." But if Mr. Kellogg will agree that the new treaty shall not supersede or interfere with the military alliance embodied in the League of Nations, or with special military alliances, or with treaties guaranteeing the neutrality of certain states, then France is willing to discuss the wording of the new treaty. M. Briand also endeavors to draw Mr. Kellogg into an assurance that the proposed renunciation of war would not deprive the powers of their right of "legitimate defense." In other words, M. Briand reserves the right, in agreeing to renounce war, to reject all disarmament plans. Fnally, he insists that a treaty to renounce war would not be effective unless it embraced all nations. Unless Russia were included, for example, it would be impossible for France to renounce war, as France is bound to defend Poland.

Thus it is evident that the cause of universal peace is not advanced by M. Briand's reply. The great powers will not agree with the United States to renounce war. They have already entered into a combination called the covenant of the League of Nations, which binds them to boycott, isolate, and make war on any nation that forces the issue by refusing to accept their dictation. In order to renounce war they would have to scrap the covenant. They do not dare to throw away their military alliances, open and secret, renounce war, and prove their good faith by disarming themselves.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations the status of the Gillett resolution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] introduced his resolution some time ago, and the matter has been before the committee and has had consideration at length by the committee. While the committee has not made any report, I am of the opinion that it is the judgment of the committee that the resolution is not relevant to the court discussion at this time and its passage would not aid in bringing the matter to a conclusion.

Let me say that the Senate, as is well known, attached five reservations to the court protocol. Those reservations were not unacceptable to the foreign powers, with the exception of reservation 5. After the Senate had passed upon the protocol and attached the reservations they were sent to the President, of course, and it became the duty of the President to transmit the protocol with the reservations to the foreign powers, and he did so. The language of article 5 is clear and not easily susceptible of being misunderstood. I do not think the delay is due to failure to understand the reservation, but it is due to a distinct unwillingness to accept the reservation without it is materially changed.

The result of the correspondence thus far is as follows: Those Governments which have accepted the reservations are Albania, Cuba, Greece, Liberia, and Luxembourg. Some ten nations have simply replied acknowledging receipt of the communication from the Government of the United States, but have made no comment. Twenty-three nations have replied, stating their objections to reservation 5. Those objections are objections based upon substantial differences of view. They clearly urge a modification of reservation 5.

The President has no power to modify the reservations. He has no power even to construe the reservations. He can only transmit to those Governments the result of the Senate's deliberation. That he has done.

The Gillett resolution proposes nothing more than to encourage the President to take up further discussion and further communication, with the view, possibly, of arriving at an understanding with these powers as to the meaning of reservation 5. But the President has no power to place any construction upon the reservation. I take it the President is to be the judge of the propriety and the nature of his communication. At any rate, it is an executive matter. The Senate has acted and advised the President; the presentation of the protocol with the reservations is peculiarly a function of the Executive. It is known that he is interested in the subject, and I must assume that he will in good faith do all that he is empowered to do.

If those who desire to make progress and wish to have a finality, will bring the protocol and the reservations back to the Senate, and the Senate will make these modifications to reservation 5 we can accomplish something. But the President can make no changes and no modifications and, in my opinion, the only thing to do, if Senators are of the opinion that reservation 5 ought to be modified, is to assume the responsibility as a Senate, and consider and discuss and pass upon that question.

My own judgment is there is no one on the committee who belives in the modification of reservation 5. My further judgment is that there are, perhaps, none in the Senate who believe in the modification of reservation 5.

We have arrived at the point where the foreign governments must either accept reservation 5, or the Senate of the United States must recede from its position, an altogether improbable thing.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, is there any such resolution pending?

Mr. BORAH. No; no such resolution is pending.

Mr. FLETCHER and Mr. REED of Pennsylvania addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Florida first.

Mr. FLETCHER. The only question in my mind was this: The signatory states, in submitting their replies, referred to "such further exchange of views as the Government of the United States may deem useful." Of course, if there is a fundamental difference, and the replies exclude any other view than that we were to recede from reservation 5, I can see that this was a mere formal objection, but if there were calls for some explanation or some clarification of the language used in reservation 5, it might open the door. These replies may make offers of a further exchange of views.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, diplomacy always indulges in language of that kind, but the fact is that a reading of the replies of these 23 nations discloses that they understand perfectly what reservation 5 means, that they are not at all in doubt as to its meaning, and that they are unable to accept it as it is.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, it was suggested not long ago that their real objection to reservation 5 was an apprehension that the United States would claim an interest in questions on which an advisory opinion was contemplated, that the action of the United States would not be in good faith, and that the interest claimed would be a fantastic interest. Was any such thought as that indicated by any of the 23 nations?

Mr. BORAH. No; no such thought as that was indicated in the correspondence that I can now recall. Let me say, further, these 23 nations which replied in the way of objection to reservation 5 have the right to object to an advisory opinion without assigning any reason. They have the power to object for no reason or for any reason which they may assign.

The United States has not claimed that right. Reservation 5 does not place the United States upon an equality with those powers. The United States claims the right when it has an interest, or when it claims an interest. Certainly the foreign powers can not object on the ground that the United States might claim an interest when they did not have any, when those powers may object without assigning as a basis for the objection even a claim of interest.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. As I understand the Senator's position, if action is really desired, the President should ask the Senate to modify its position on reservation 5, or the Senate itself should notify the President that it has changed its position.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; that is the only way action can be had, unless the foreign governments accept reservation 5. So far as I am individually concerned, expressing my view and not the view of the committee, I would support a resolution, if anybody wanted to introduce one, to bring the protocol and reservation 5 back to the Senate to ascertain the views of the Senate as to modification. I should not hesitate a moment to have that matter reopened before the Senate, and I should not hesitate to have it reopened before the country. Some people seem to think that the United States by reservation 5 has claimed an advantage which the foreign powers have not. As a matter of fact, reservation 5 is a modest contention compared with the power which the foreign governments have with reference to this court and with reference to advisory opinions.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator from Idaho was not in the Chamber a moment ago when I propounded a question to the Senator from Pennsylvania. I suggested to him, inferentially, if not directly, that my understanding was that a number of the signatories to the protocol were somewhat apprehensive as to the interpretation which would be placed by the United States on the words "has or claims to have an interest." I recollect seeing some newspaper comments upon this matter, and they did express the view that some of the signatories to the protocol were not sure that we would claim, as lawyers would express it, a juridical interest, that if we had a real interest, such a lawyers understand an interest to be, there was no objection whatever to the reservation.

I suggested then that I thought that the Senate could initiate such proceedings as would enable us to clarify that reservation, so that any valid misapprehension might be removed from the minds of any of the signatories to the protocol.

I agree with the Senator that, interpreting the resolution as I do, it means only that we must have a valid, a real interest; such an interest as would justify a litigant in bringing action in court, and that without such an interest, the United States would have no right to interpose to prevent the court from giving opinions.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, has any one of these 23 nations asked to have reservation 5 clarified?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I construe their letter, they have not, but I am perfectly aware that there is language in their communication which, taken alone and lifted out of its context, could very easily be construed in that light. In my opinion these Governments have plainly stated that reservation 5 must be substantially modified before it can be accepted.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BLAINE. Only for the purpose of seeking information I desire to ask the Senator his opinion with respect to this question. Within what time may the 23 nations, which have rejected the fifth reservation, change their position and accept it?

Mr. BORAH. There is no limit as to time. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE] has introduced a resolution, which is before my committee, that might put a limit on the time, but there was no limit on the reservation.

Mr. BLAINE. If the United States desires to withdraw entirely from consideration of the World Court question, is a joint resolution necessary to withdraw the adherence of the United States to the World Court with reservations?

Mr. BORAH. Yes. As the matter now stands, if the foreign nations are willing to accept the reservations, the matter would be closed. The only way we could avoid that would be, in my judgment, by specific action. I know of no effective way to do it except to recall the protocol from the President, and I do not know how we would view the request. Then we could, even if it were accepted, abrogate the treaty.

Mr. President, before I recur further to my own views about the matter, I want to read a paragraph from an article by the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. That Senator, as we all know, was one of the most earnest and able advocates of our adherence to the protocol of the court, but in discussing reservation 5 over which the controversy arises, he lately said in an article:

> That reservation represents simply an attempt to put this Nation on a footing of substantial equality with every other having permanent representation on the council, any one of which may, at will, veto such a request, a right which arises from the requirement of unanimity on any question before it save matters of mere procedure. If Great Britain or France or Italy finds that it will be in any wise embarrassed by any decision that may be made pursuant to a request from the council, it may forestall an opinion by voting in that body against submitting the question. It would scarcely comport with the dignity of the United States to join in upholding the court except upon a basis of equality with every other leading power. It is easy to conceive of questions which the United States would not care to have submitted to the court for determination, just as it is not difficult to frame inquiries which some other great nations would not care to have answered. Any of the other great powers may say nay—assuming unanimity to be required, never questioned until after the Senate acted—why should not the United States?

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. Reservation 5 goes further than simply trying to obtain equality as members of the council of the League of Nations. The whole basis of the court is that no nation may be haled before it without its consent, either for an advisory opinion or a judgment. The court decided that in the East Carelian case. Forty-eighth nations that have joined the league in an article which they signed, I think article 14, agreed that the council and the assembly shall be their agents to give assent or dissent for them as to whether an advisory opinion should be asked or not asked. That article was included in the covenant when they joined the league, and the members selected this agency to act for them when they joined. The members of the league have done that. Consequently their assent is given by the council or the assembly.

The question was presented to us, How can we be on an equality before that court? We could not select the assembly or the council of the league to be our agents and to represent us. We have to act independently. All that reservation 5 does is to give the United States the same right to assent or dissent that the other nations have through their representatives, the council or the assembly. They have chosen either of those to act as agents for them. This is the only formula by which the United States could be put on an equality and have its consent or its dissent expressed for an advisory opinion.

The 48 nations give their assent how? By and through the agents they selected when they joined the league. They consented to that arrangement. We simply ask the right as principals to have the same right that their agent possesses in connection with advisory opinions.

Mr. BORAH. It ought to be remembered, too, that that agency can be withdrawn at any time.

Mr. SWANSON. Which agency?

Mr. BORAH. The plan of making the council their agent can be withdrawn at any time.

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; at any time, and if the members of the league desire to have each individual member give assent or dissent, to act for itself, that could be accomplished by amending the covenant of the league if they saw proper to do so. If they consent to have their agent express their assent or dissent for them and we can not select that agency unless we are members of the league, the only way we could be on an equality would be to have the same right that their agent possesses for them. The East Carelian case, decided when Russia was not a party and challenged the right of the court to act, as she had not given her consent for the expression of an advisory opinion, was decided by a majority of the court holding that no nation could have an advisory opinion or judgment rendered against it without its consent.

That is all that reservation 5 does for us. It requires the consent of the United States. When this opinion went back to the league, instead of acquiescing in the opinion they appointed a committee of the council of the league to pass upon the judgment of the court rendered in the East Carelian case. That committee reported back that the court must render its opinion whenever asked by the council or the assembly, whether any other nation consented or not. When it came up for determination in the council it was postponed, as I understand it, and never has been passed on by the council. When that occurred, those of us who felt that the United States ought to be on terms of equality in the court with every other nation, thought seriously from day to day for a long time about how to accomplish this, and reservation 5 was formulated and is intended to carry into effect and make effective, so far as the United States is concerned, the decision reached by the court in the East Carelian case.

As the Senator from Idaho has well said, we are not on an equality. We have to say and we are in honor bound to state that we have an interest in a case.

Mr. BORAH. Or claim an interest.

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; or claim an interest. We are in honor and in good conscience and fair dealing bound to say that we have an interest and claim such interest. Consequently we are in honor bound, where we have a substantial interest, to so state it and then the court has not jurisdiction without our consent. If we should leave it to the court to determine our interest, we would not be on terms of equality with nations who are members of the league.

The court does not determine whether a member of the council of other nations objects finally to an opinion. That is determined by them for themselves. They veto it in council, where it is required to be unanimous. Consequently the only way we could be on terms of equality and assert the claim effectively would be to put in that language which was included and agreed on by the various friends of the court when they met, and also by the administration, as being proper to make effective the decision in the East Carelian case.

If it is determined that the council require unanimous consent before it can ask an advisory opinion, then the other nations have no objection to reservation 5, but whether they decide that it takes a majority vote or unanimous vote, I insist that we still could only give our consent by this method to be on terms of equality with other nations, because their agent, whether it acts by majority vote or unanimous vote, can not be accepted by us as our agent, and that is a question for us to determine as principals for ourselves. It is not for the members of the league to determine for us. All we ask is to be put on an equality, to give our assent or dissent precisely with the same authority that as the agent the council possess for the members of the league under the covenant. Reservation 5 was drawn with that object in view. I have been unable to find any other way to establish an equality. The United States should not enter except under terms of equality. If the members of the league desire for each nation constituting the league to have this power, they can accomplish this by amending the covenant of the league and let each nation give assent individually and not through an agency of the council. We certainly could not offer properly amendments to the covenant of the league of which we were not a member.

The only place where I think the Gillett resolution would be effective is this: I do not think the Senate would consent to change the reservation, but it will be noted in the reply of the other nations that they invite further correspondence. It was not final.

Mr. BORAH. It was not final in the language. There is no question——

Mr. SWANSON. It seems to me that the administration should have taken some further steps in the matter. I do not believe in finally concluding the matter without sending a reply when a reply was requested. I understand the object of the Gillett resolution is not to change the reservation. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] says so himself, and says that it is merely intended to ask the administration to take the matter up, accept the invitation, and see if we can not induce the other nations to accept the reservation contained in our resolution of adherence to the protocol of the World Court.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Could that be done without a resolution?

Mr. SWANSON. It could be done without a resolution. The administration has not been as active and as energetic and as enthusiastic as it ought to have been in this matter, and the resolution indicates it is desirous of making it move faster and more earnestly. I understand this as the object sought to be accomplished by the Gillett resolution.

Mr. BORAH. The peculiar thing to me is, if it is simply desired to stir up the President, why they do not write to the President direct.

Mr. SWANSON. A resolution could be adopted by the Senate to that effect. We could do it in that way.

Mr. BORAH. Of course the Senate has nothing in the world to do with the correspondence of the President of the United States with foreign powers.

Mr. SWANSON. But the Senator has introduced a resolution suggesting to the President action about the recognition of Russia. Why is that more important than our getting into the World Court? The Senator makes a suggestion to the President. Is it treason for the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] and a patriotic duty for the Senator from Idaho to pursue the same course and make similar suggestions to the President?

Mr. BORAH. If I should have succeeded in having my resolution passed providing for the recognition of Russia, I should not have followed it up by telling the President what kind of a letter to write. I should have assumed that the President of the United States would be competent to write the kind of a communication which should go from one government to another, and in proper form and style. The difference between the instance which the Senator cites and this is that the Senate in this instance has acted, the Senate has advised and the sole duty left is that of communicating with foreign governments—that is peculiarly the duty of the President.

Mr. SWANSON. The Gillett resolution does not suggest anything with reference to style, as the Senator states. It simply suggests to the President that he shall respond to the request of the other nations for further communication.

Mr. BORAH. It assumes that the President is unable to construe in the proper light the letters which he has received.

Mr. SWANSON. No; they suggest to him, not as the Senator suggested to him, to see what he can do about the matter. I do not see any difference in now making a suggestion to the President that the Senate would be pleased if he took certain action. If the President could induce these people to accept the reservations, then we could enter the World Court. The Senator would be pleased if the President, by his diplomacy, could arrange for the recognition of Russia.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, in my opinion this way of approaching the question is not very dignified upon the part of the Senate. If the Senator from Virginia or anyone else wants to introduce a resolution asking the sense of the Senate as to whether it will modify reservation 5, we can reach the question then as to whether the position of the United States is open to construction. Unless it is, the mere formality of passing the reservation in the protocol from the President to the other powers is something it seems to me we can leave to the discretion of the President.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senate is in no condition to negotiate any communication with foreign powers.

Mr. BORAH. I am not asking for any negotiation.

Mr. SWANSON. If the President is to change these reservations and in his conscience and good judgment thinks we ought to do it, it is his duty to send them to the Senate for approval.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator from Virginia wants to change them, he should seek to have them returned to the only body which can change them.

Mr. SWANSON. If I wanted to change them, I would adopt such a course as that; and if they were returned and they did not agree with the President's conception, then we could not get anywhere. The question whether we will adhere to the protocol even as agreed to by the Senate is finally left to the President. He can refuse to consent even if the Senate should reach a favorable decision. The matter is left finally and absolutely to him under our Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. But he has delivered it to all of them.

Mr. SWANSON. He has delivered it to all of them, but they have not accepted it; it has been in his hands up to the present time. I do not see why it is treason to make the suggestions to the President in the one case and to waive them in the other.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BLEASE. Does not the Senator think if the Republican Party does not renominate Mr. Coolidge that we shall have a chance to have another President consider this subject about as quickly as we could get the resolution relating to it adopted by the Senate?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is too early in the week to get into the question of the presidential nomination; but, in all seriousness, anyone who will read the letter of the 23 nations, in answer to the President's communication, will immediately conclude that those powers understand perfectly the meaning of reservation 5, and their suggestions imply substantial changes in reservation 5. The President has no power to make such changes; we alone have that power. I will join with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] or with any other Senator in bringing the question back to the Senate for the purpose of getting its views upon it. Indeed I should like to bring this matter to a conclusion. I have read these replies of the foreign governments and I have no doubt as to what they mean. They understand reservation 5, understand it perfectly, and they urge a modification. Now, are we willing to modify it? If not, I see nothing that we can do with propriety or effect.

former employee of the Treasury Department (Bureau of Engraving and Printing), the sum of $50 per month, this compensation to commence from and after the date of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1271) to more effectively meet the obligations of the United States under the migratory-bird treaty with Great Britain by lessening the dangers threatening migratory game birds from drainage and other causes, by the acquisition of areas of land and of water to furnish in perpetuity reservations for the adequate protection of such birds, and by providing funds for the establishment of such areas, their maintenance and improvement, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BLEASE. Let that bill go over.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1939) granting pensions and increase of pensions to widows and former widows of certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill be passed over temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over temporarily on the suggestion of the Senator from Utah.

SEGREGATION OF PASSENGERS ON STREET CARS

The bill (S. 781) requiring separate accommodations for white and colored passengers on street cars in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I do not think there is any Senator here especially anxious to vote on that bill until after the general election.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. To which bill does the Senator from South Carolina refer?

Mr. BLEASE. To Senate bill 781, relating to the segregation of passengers on street cars in the District. I think both sides of the Chamber would like to have it go over until they find out how the delegates are going to vote. Therefore, I move that the bill be taken from the calendar and placed under the head of "Subjects on the table."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator from South Carolina that the proper course to pursue, in my opinion, would be to let the bill go to the calendar under Rule IX.

Mr. BLEASE. Let it lie on the table and go over until the next session.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest to the Senator from South Carolina unless he desires that the bill shall be postponed indefinitely to request that it be placed on the calendar under Rule IX.

Mr. BLEASE. I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Utah, and I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina.

The motion was agreed to.

LE ROY K. PEMBERTON AND OTHERS

The bill (S. 132) to authorize the President to appoint Le Roy K. Pemberton a first lieutenant, Officers' Reserve Corps, United States Army, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, there are four bills on the calendar somewhat similar in character which have been adversely reported. I ask once more that they go over. I do not desire to have them indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bills referred to by the Senator from California will go over.

The bill (S. 2053) to establish a military record for Daniel P. Tafe was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At the request of the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE], the bill will be passed over.

CHARLES CAUDWELL

The bill (S. 1736) for the relief of Charles Caudwell was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, let us have a brief explanation of the bill.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, this is a bill that was introduced by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], the chairman of the Committee on Claims, at the request of the War Department. Immediately after the World War the commanding general in England sold some material to Mr. Caudwell. The material was never delivered but Mr. Caudwell paid the Government the money. The Government has had his money now for about 10 years. The bill does not even provide for the payment of interest; it is simply a bill to repay Mr. Caudwell the money which he paid for articles which he never received. That is the whole effect of the bill. The War Department has requested that it be passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, in line 4, after the words "directed to," to strike out the words "settle the claim of" and to insert the words "pay to"; and in line 5, after the name "England," to strike out the word "in" and insert "from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Charles Caudwell, Congleton, Cheshire, England, from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,219.65, or so much thereof as may be required to purchase exchange not to exceed the amount of £2,100, in full settlement of all claims of said Charles Caudwell growing out of his purchase of ovens at London, England, in June and July, 1919.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 141) for the relief of Felix Medler was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over on the request of the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE].

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

CHARLES A. BLACK

The bill (H. R. 3315) for the relief of Charles A. Black, alias Angus Black, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Charles A. Black, alias Angus Black, who was a member of Company B, Eleventh Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a private of that organization on the 17th day of August, 1861: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowances shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WALTER W. JOHNSTON

The bill (S. 2711) for the relief of Walter W. Johnston was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, when this bill came up previously for consideration on the call of the calendar I objected to it. Since the bill was reached on that occasion I have gone into the question involved pretty carefully, and find there is a moral obligation, at least, on the part of the Government for the amount stated. Therefore, I shall make no further objection to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Walter W. Johnston, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $15,000, as full compensation to him, the said Walter W. Johnston, for personal services rendered and the use of appliances personally owned and operated by him in connection with the launching of the ships at the shipyards of the fourth district during the year 1918, said work being done by order of and under the direction of the district supervisor of the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, and for which the claimant has not been compensated, as was provided in an agreement entered into by him with the said district supervisor.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROHIBITION OF WAR

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 1) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting war was announced as next in order.

The joint resolution had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary adversely.

Mr. JONES. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] is not at present in the Chamber. I do not know whether he desires that the joint resolution should remain on the calendar or not. It has been kept there for some time, and, I think, probably at his request. In his absence, I ask that it may remain on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the joint resolution will retain its place on the calendar.

KENNETH B. TURNER

The bill (S. 133) for the relief of Kenneth B. Turner was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

STANDARDIZATION OF HAMPERS, ETC.

The bill (H. R. 2148) to fix standards for hampers, round stave baskets, and splint baskets for fruits and vegetables, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Presdent, I think there is no opposition to the passage of the bill, since I have met by the acceptance of amendments every requirement which has been suggested, but I promised the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] that I would not permit the bill to be called up in his absence, and if I may have it passed over until he returns to the floor I shall appreciate it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

CROP INSURANCE

HORTICULTURAL EXPERIMENTS IN SOUTHERN GREAT PLAINS AREA

The bill (S. 2832) providing for horticultural experiment and demonstration work in the southern Great Plains area was announced as next in order.

Mr. PINE. Mr. President, I ask that House bill 405, being Calendar No. 716, be substituted for the bill the title of which has just been stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma whether there has been any change in the House bill as compared with the provisions of the Senate bill which is now on the calendar?

Mr. PINE. There has been no change whatever.

Mr. SMOOT. The two bills are the same?

Mr. PINE. They are both on the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I am aware of that.

Mr. PINE. And are exactly the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oklahoma that Order of Business 716, being House bill 405, be substituted for Senate bill 2832? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Senate, as in Committee on the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 405) providing for horticultural experiment and demonstration work in the southern Great Plains area, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized and directed to cause such shade, ornamental, fruit, and shelter belt trees, shrubs, and vines as are adapted to the conditions and needs of the southern Great Plains area, comprised of those parts of the States of Colorado, Nebraska, Kansas, Texas, Oklahoma, and New Mexico lying west of the ninety-eighth meridian and east of the 5,000-foot contour line, to be propagated at one of the existing field stations of the Department of Agriculture in such area, and seedlings and cuttings and seeds of such trees, shrubs, and vines to be distributed free of charge under such regulations as he may prescribe for experimental and demonstration purposes within such area.

SEC. 2. That for carrying out the purposes of this act, including purchase of land and erection of buildings, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $35,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture.

SEC. 3. That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated each fiscal year thereafter necessary appropriations to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry on the experiments contemplated by this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, Senate bill 2832 will be indefinitely postponed.

DECORATIONS FOR OFFICERS OF NAVY AND MARINE CORPS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments reported by the committee have heretofore been agreed to.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I have heretofore presented an amendment to the bill, which I should like to have considered at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, line 21, it is proposed to insert the following:

That all recommendations for decoration by the United States of America now pending before the War Department, Navy Department, or Marine Corps for services rendered during the World War be considered by the proper boards or authorities, and awards made in such cases as the conduct of those recommended shows them to be entitled and deserving of the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TYDINGS. On page 2, line 1, after the name "Dayton," I move to insert the name "Rear Admiral Louis M. Nulton."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr PHIPPS. Mr. President, I think several Senators who are not now present are interested in the bill. I, therefore, ask that it go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over without prejudice on the request of the Senator from Colorado.

The bill (S. 2292) providing for the employment of certain civilian assistants in the office of the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, and fixing salaries of certain officials, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BINGHAM. In view of the fact that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who is very much interested in this bill and desires to be heard in opposition to it, is not present in the Chamber, I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

MATERIAL FOR MILITARY AND NAVAL USE

The bill (S. 1831) to authorize the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to class as secret certain material, apparatus, or equipment for military and naval use, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, on page 1, line 3, after the word "That," to strike out "in addition to authority heretofore granted, the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are," and insert "The President is"; in line 5, after the word "in," to strike out "their" and insert "his"; and on page 2, line 14, after the word "the," to strike out "Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy" and insert "President," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is empowered, in his discretion, to class as secret or confidential any material, apparatus, or equipment for military or naval use which is of such nature that the interests of the public service would be injured by publicly divulging information concerning them, and may authorize purchases and award contracts for the development, manufacture, or procurement thereof without public advertisement for bids or notice to the trade: Provided, That such purchases and contracts shall not be made or awarded except under circumstances where it shall be impracticable to develop, manufacture, or procure such material, apparatus, or equipment in Government establishments: Provided further, That when such material, apparatus, or equipment has been classed as secret or confidential the head of any Government department, establishment, or agency shall take proper measures to maintain the secret or confidential nature thereof and of the contracts and pertinent paper relating thereto: And provided further, That the decision of the President as to what material, apparatus, or equipment shall be classed as secret or confidential, and as to whether or not it is practicable to develop, manufacture, or procure such material, apparatus, or equipment in Government establishments shall be final and conclusive.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. I did not wish to object until the amendments were considered. I now ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENSE ACT

The bill (S. 1838) to amend section 110 of the national defense act by repealing and striking therefrom certain provisions prescribing additional qualifications for National Guard State staff officers, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, the House has passed House bill 239, of almost the same tenor, and exactly the same effect. I move that that bill be substituted for Senate bill 1838.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the number of the bill?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. House bill 239. It is not now on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Committee on Military Affairs is discharged from the further consideration of the House bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I have no objection to the substitution of the House bill, but I ask that it go over.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is, after the substitution is made?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the House bill will be substituted for the Senate bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 239) to amend section 110 of the national defense act by repealing and striking therefrom certain provisions prescribing additional qualifications for National Guard State staff officers, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have some amendments to propose to that bill, and I think by consultation with the distinguished Senator from Ohio we can arrive at an understanding with regard to them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 759) to give the Supreme Court of the United States authority to make and publish rules in common-law actions was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This bill is reported adversely.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1377) for the relief of Lieut. Robert Stanley Robertson, jr., United States Navy, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

CHARLES R. SIES

The bill (S. 151) for the relief of Charles R. Sies was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I should like the attention of the Senator from Utah for a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah withhold his objection?

Mr. KING. I shall be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. As the date of the report indicates, this bill has been on the calendar for many weeks. The committee reported the bill favorably, as the Senator will observe; and I think I am warranted in saying that each and every member of the committee was familiar with the case.

If the Senator will be good enough to look at the report, directing attention as I do to the last paragraph on the first page, the case is stated there.

Section 25 of the act of March 4, 1925, provides that—

Any officer of the regular Navy, who has been retired since December 31, 1921, by reason of physical disability which originated in the line of duty at any time between April 6, 1917, and March 3, 1921, inclusive, while holding higher temporary rank, shall be advanced on the retired list to, or shall be placed on the retired list in, such higher grade or rank.

While Mr. Sies's physical disability was incurred within the period above prescribed, he was not eligible for the benefits and considerations of the terms of that section, as he was retired prior to December 31, 1921. That is, he was retired on December 5, 1921, 26 days prior to the period stated by law; and the bill seeks to grant him the benefits to which he is entitled, similar to other officers of the Navy who incurred disability while serving under a higher temporary commission.

The point of the case, the turning point, perhaps the very merit of the case, lies in the fact that he was retired a few days before the date fixed in the law, December 31. He retired on the 5th of the month instead of the 31st. He was a brave officer; he suffered permanent disability; and we seek to give him the relief indicated in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I opposed the general retirement bill. I thought it was unwise. I still think it unwise. I think it unfair to the enlisted men who served in the World War. Having passed that bill, I should like to see what its full implications are. It may be that the beneficiary under this bill will come within the terms of the general retirement act. At any rate, I ask my dear friend from California to forgive me if I ask that it go over for the moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

The bill (S. 1731) to provide for the more complete development of vocational education in the several States and Territories was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 1, line 3, after the words "Providing for the," to strike out "more complete" and insert "further"; in line 5, after the word "hereby," to insert "authorized to be"; in line 9, after the word "and," to strike out "for each year" and insert "annually"; in line 10, before the word "appropriated," to insert "authorized to be"; on page 2, line 7, after the word "the," to strike out "further development and improvement" and insert "salaries of teachers, supervisors, and directors"; in line 10, before the words "in such States," to strike out "agriculture" and insert "agricultural subjects"; in line 11, after the word "their," to strike out "total" and insert "rural"; in the same line, after the word "total," where it occurs the second time, to insert "rural"; in line 16, after the word "the," to insert "salaries of teachers, supervisors, and directors"; and in line 17, after the word "economics," to insert "subjects," so as to make the section read:

That for the purpose of providing for the further development of vocational education in the several States there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, the sum of $500,000, and for each year thereafter, for 11 years, a sum exceeding by $500,000 the sum appropriated for each preceding year and annually thereafter there is permanently authorized to be appropriated for each year the sum of $6,000,000. One-half of such sums shall be allotted to the States in the proportion that their farm population bears to the total farm population of the United States, exclusive of the Territories and insular possessions, according to the United States census last preceding the end of the fiscal year in which any such allotment is to be made, and shall be used for the salaries of teachers, supervisors, and directors of agricultural subjects in such States. The remaining half of such sums shall be allotted to the States in the proportion that their rural population bears to the total rural population of the United States, exclusive of the Territories and insular possessions, according to the United States census last preceding the end of the fiscal year in which any such allotment is to be made, and shall be used for the salaries of teachers, supervisors, and directors, development and improvement of home economics subjects in such States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 2, after the words "purpose of," to strike out "enabling the Federal Board for Vocational Education to further assist the States in the development of agricultural and home economics programs for the rural districts, there is hereby annually appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000" and insert "carrying out the provisions of this act there is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Federal Board for Vocational Education, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000 annually, to be expended for the same purposes and in the same manner as provided in section 7 of the act approved February 23, 1917, as amended October 6, 1917," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act there is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Federal Board for Vocational Education, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000 annually to be expended for the same purposes and in the same manner as provided in section 7 of the act approved February 23, 1917, as amended October 6, 1917.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 3, line 21, after the word "year," to insert "and that the appropriations available to the Federal Board for Vocational Education for salaries and expenses shall be available for expenses of attendance at meetings of educational associations and other organizations, which, in the opinion of the board, are necessary for the efficient discharge of its responsibilities," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. The appropriations made by this act shall be in addition to, and shall be subject to the same conditions and limitations as, the appropriations made by the act entitled "An act to provide for the promotion of vocational education; to provide cooperation with the States in the promotion of such education in agriculture and in the trades and industries; to provide cooperation with the States in the preparation of teachers of vocational subjects; and to appropriate money and regulate its expenditures," approved February 23, 1917, except that the appropriation made by this act for home economics shall be subject to the conditions and limitations applicable to the appropriation for agricultural purposes under such act of February 23, 1917, with the exception of that part of section 10 thereof which requires directed or supervised practice for at least six months per year, and that the appropriations available to the Federal Board for Vocational Education for salaries and expenses shall be available for expenses of attendance at meetings of educational associations and other organizations, which, in the opinion of the board, are necessary for the efficient discharge of its responsibilities.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I should like to ask the author of the bill whether he would not be willing to permit the Territories to benefit under the act, as well as the States. The Territory of Hawaii pays into the Federal Treasury in income taxes as much as nearly the aggregate of 12 States, and it seems to me the Territories ought to benefit under this act. I have prepared a series of amendments adding the words "and Territories" wherever necessary, and I hope the author of the bill will not object to them.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I desire to say that I agreed with the late Senator from Ohio, Mr. Willis, to accept those amendments, providing he would offer them on the floor; and I have no objection to them.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the Senator.

On page 1, line 5, after the word "States," I move to insert the words "and Territories."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. On page 2, line 2, after the word "States," insert the words "and Territories."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. On page 2, line 4, strike out the words "Territories and."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. In line 9, after the word "States," insert the words "and Territories."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. In line 10, after the word "States," insert the words "and Territories."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. In line 12, strike out the last word in the line, "Territories," and the first word in line 13, "and."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. In line 18, after the word "States," insert the words "and Territories."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. I shall also move at the proper time to amend the title by adding after the words "States" the words "and Territories."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the provisions of the bill, and to the adverse report from the President of the United States. The recommendation of the Budget is that this is against the financial policy of the President; and, therefore, it does not receive the approval of the Budget Bureau; and, of course, does not receive the approval of the President. I do not mean to intimate that the President, if the bill shall reach him, will veto it.

Mr. President, there is one feature of this legislation that I do not like. I want to be entirely frank with regard to the matter. This bill is not satisfied with making an appropriation for two years or four years, but makes it forever; and, of course, it rivets upon the States the 50–50 proposition and commits them, so far as the Federal Government may coerce them, to a perpetual appropriation—a permanent appropriation to match the permanent appropriation which is hereby authorized.

I confess that I do not like legislation of that character—legislation which first commits or requires the States forever to make certain appropriations. It is holding a bludgeon over their heads and saying to them, "We will not give you forever this $6,000,000 annually unless you appropriate a like amount."

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I dislike to differ at all with the distinguished Senator from Utah, but no force is to be used by the Federal Government. It is purely voluntary. If a State does not want to participate in these benefits, it need not.

Mr. KING. Oh, I understand that. I thought I made that clear. I said it was a bludgeon. It is in a sense coercive. It says to them, "You can not get any of the $6,000,000 unless you respond 50–50," and, of course, a State will hesitate, with the pressure which will be brought to bear, to fail to respond; so that in the long run it is a moral coercion, if it is not a physical or a legal one. The Senator knows that any State that held out for a little while would bring upon its head the anathemas of all of the bureaucrats in the Department of Agriculture as well as the opposition of surrounding States, so that, after all, it is a moral compulsion which we seek by this bill to impose upon the States for all time.

I have no objection to an appropriation for two years or for four years, as we have been making appropriations in the past; but here we are insisting that we commit the Government for all time to this appropriation. I think it is unwise legislation. Certainly it has not commended itself to the judgment of the President of the United States, who, whether we agree with him politically or not, is seeking to discharge with fidelity the high responsibilities of his great office.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendments to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the further development of vocational education in the several States and Territories."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2859) for the relief of Francis J. Young was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, if this bill is to be considered, I think it should be amended.

Mr. KING. Let it go over.

Mr. JONES. Let me suggest before it goes over that the bill purports actually to appropriate money. It says, "There is hereby appropriated." I think that ought to be changed. At any rate, if the Senator will withhold his objection, I move to insert, in line 8, after the word "hereby," the words "authorized to be."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Utah withhold his objection for the purpose of adopting the amendment?

Mr. KING. Yes.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Francis J. Young, father of Wallace J. Young, late consul at Bradford, England, $4,500, being one year's salary of his deceased son, who died of illness incurred in the Consular Service; and there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sufficient sum to carry out the purpose of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Then the bill can go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over

STANDARD WEIGHTS AND MEASURES

The bill (S. 2864) to establish the standard of weights and measures for the following wheat-mill, rye-mill, and corn-mill products, namely, flours, semolina, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TYSON] said he had no objection to this measure if in the last line the word "one" were changed to "two," so as to give the dealers two years. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], however, wrote a letter in reference to it, and I do not know whether he has had an answer or not.

Mr. BLACK. I have not had a reply. There was an objection raised by a constituent of mine, and I would like to have the bill go over until I can hear from him.

Mr. CURTIS. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. CURTIS subsequently said: Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama has withdrawn his objection to the consideration of Senate bill 2864, and I ask that we return to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2864) to establish the standard of weights and measures for the following wheat-mill, rye-mill, and corn-mill products, namely, flours, semolina, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs, and for other purposes.

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest an amendment, on page 5, line 5, to strike out the words "one year" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "two years."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Kansas whether this changes in any way the existing system of weights and measures.

Mr. CURTIS. I understand not. If the Senator has objection to the measure, I have no objection to it going over.

Mr. KING. I do not want to object, if the Senator has given it attention and the committee think it is wise legislation.

Mr. CURTIS. The committee reports it unanimously, and the Acting Secretary of Agriculture approved the measure. There has been no objection to it except as to the one-year limitation. Some dealers have smaller packages at this time, and they think it might take two years to get rid of them. After two years the bill would require a uniform-sized package. It standardizes the packages; it provides that they shall be 5, 10, 25, and so forth.

Mr. DILL. It does not affect anything but grain, as I understand.

Mr. CURTIS. Nothing but grain and grain products.

Mr. KING. Is it meant to interfere with shipments in interstate commerce of packages that may not conform with this measure?

Mr. CURTIS. It does not interfere with shipments but it gives the producers two years to adopt a uniform system. Some packages now weigh 102 pounds, while nearly all packages weigh 100 pounds. This bill would require that packages be put up in decimal fractions of 100 pounds.

Mr. KING. Suppose I should desire to ship the Senator 90 pounds, and under a contract I make a shipment of 90 pounds of a given commodity. Would that be an offense?

Mr. CURTIS. It would not.

Mr. KING. If it is intended to interfere with contractual relations, and to compel shippers of the commodities herein referred to to adopt——

Mr. CURTIS. As I understand the bill, it does not intend to infringe upon contractual relations at all.

Mr. KING. With that assurance, I have no objection to it, but if it does interfere with contractual relations, it would be an impediment to business, instead of a benefit.

Mr. JONES. What is the character of these packages? I have not had an opportunity to look carefully into the measure.

Mr. CURTIS. It seeks to establish a standard of weights and measures for wheat-mill, rye-mill, and corn-mill products, such as flours, semolina, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs.

Mr. JONES. Does the Senator understand that under this bill one could not ship packages containing these foods or products in a manner different from that prescribed in the bill?

Mr. CURTIS. No; one could ship them. This provides merely for a standard package offered for sale in the market. It is to provide that the packages shall all be regular, so that when you go into a store, after two years, and buy, you will buy a 5-pound package or a 10-pound package, instead of, perhaps, a 3-pound package or a 2-pound package; you will be sold packages of 5, 10, 25 pounds, and so forth, and 100 pounds instead of 102 pounds. In other words, it is to standardize the packages.

Mr. JONES. Why should we not pass some law under which we would require the amount contained in any package to appear on the outside of it, and punish for the shipment of a package containing less than that, rather than prescribe a certain-sized package in which the shipments shall be made?

Mr. CURTIS. The bill provides that for commercial feeding stuffs only, 60 or 80 pounds, each of which shall bear a plain, legible, and conspicuous statement of the net weight contained therein.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). The bill will be passed over.

KARIM JOSEPH MERY

The bill (S. 1970) for the relief of Karim Joseph Mery was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to Karim Joseph Mery, of San Antonio, Tex., out of any money not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, as compensation for the death of his son, Joseph Karim Mery, a minor, who was killed at San Antonio, Tex., on July 10, 1923, by the negligent driving of a United States Army truck.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COTTON AND GRAIN IN FUTURE MARKETS

The bill (S. 1093) to prevent the sale of cotton and grain in future markets was announced as next in order.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, that bill is on the Legislative Calendar, having a preferred place. We could not finish its consideration under a limitation of five minutes for debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The bill will be passed over.

JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 57) requesting the President to immediately withdraw the armed forces of the United States from Nicaragua was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

FARM RELIEF

The bill (S. 3555) to establish a Federal farm board to aid in the orderly marketing and in the control and disposition of the surplus of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the unfinished business, and will be passed over.

JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 99) to amend joint resolution directing the Interstate Commerce Commission to take action relative to adjustments in the rate structure of common carriers subject to the interstate commerce act, and the fixing of rates and charges, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

GRANT OF LANDS IN NEW MEXICO

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2535) granting to the State of New Mexico certain lands for reimbursement of the counties of Grant, Luna, Hidalgo, and Santa Fe for interest paid on railroad-aid bonds, and for the payment of the principal of railroad-aid bonds issued by the town of Silver City, and to reimburse said town for interest paid on said bonds, and for other purposes, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby granted to the State of New Mexico 400,000 acres of the surveyed nonmineral unappropriated and unreserved public lands of the United States within said State, in trust, for the reimbursement of Grant, Luna, and Hidalgo Counties for interest paid by said counties on the bonds of Grant County, and for the reimbursement of Santa Fe County for interest paid by said county on the bonds of Santa Fe County, all of which said bonds were validated, approved, and confirmed by act of Congress of January 16, 1897 (29 Stat. 487); and also for the payment of the principal of the bonds issued by the town of Silver City and likewise validated by said act of January 16, 1897, and to reimburse said town of Silver City for interest paid by said town on said bonds: Provided, That if there shall remain any of the 400,000 acres of land so granted, or of the proceeds of the sale or lease thereof, or rents, issues, or profits therefrom, after the payment of said items and debt, such remainder of lands and the proceeds of sales thereof shall be added to and become a part of the permanent school fund of said State.

SEC. 2. That the said lands shall be selected in the same manner as provided for the selection of lands granted to the State of New Mexico by an act of the Congress of the United States approved June 20, 1910, entitled "An act to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," and such lands shall be leased and sold in such manner and under such limitations and restrictions as are provided in the said act of June 20, 1910.

SEC. 3. Said State of New Mexico through its State board of finance shall determine the interest paid by said counties on said indebtedness, and the manner of liquidating the same, and likewise the amount of the principal due on the bonds issued by the town of Silver City, and the interest paid by said town and the manner of liquidating the same.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania subsequently said: Mr. President, Senate bill 2535 was considered and passed so quickly that there was no opportunity to study it. I would like to ask that it go over, unless we can have an explanation of it.

Mr. BRATTON. I shall be glad to explain it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the vote by which the bill was passed will be reconsidered.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, from 1880 to 1887, while New Mexico was a Territory, the counties of Grant and Santa Fe, and the town of Silver City, issued bonds in aid of railroad construction. Certain counties in Arizona did likewise.

In 1894 the Supreme Court of the United States held, in what is called the Pima County, Ariz., case, that a county or a municipality of a Territory did not have the power to issue bonds of that character and decided that the bonds there involved were absolutely void. The case fits the New Mexico situation perfectly. Its effect was to adjudicate that those bonds were absolutely void.

The bonds were in the possession of bondholders throughout the country. In 1897 the bondholders persuaded the Congress to pass an act validating those bonds and establishing liability for their payment, notwithstanding the fact that the counties and the town had no right to issue them.

When statehood in New Mexico was approaching, and the enabling act was under consideration, the Congress made a grant of land to the State to reimburse the bondholders; that is, to take up the outstanding bonds. In that, however, they overlooked the fact that these counties and this town had paid money—that is, that they had paid then and have paid since money aggregating nearly $400,000—upon a debt that was never valid except by the arbitrary act of Congress fixing liability for it.

In connection with the consideration of the enabling act Senator Beveridge said this in explaining that grant of land:

So these bonds were declared invalid. The history of both the New Mexico bonds of this kind and of the Arizona bonds of this kind is unusually interesting, but it is not necessary, of course, for me to go into that now. It is given in our report very carefully.

* * * * * * *

But whatever the reason was, Congress, after the Supreme Court had declared these bonds invalid, passed a law validating them. Upon that principle, I think, it was practically the unanimous opinion of members of the Committee on Territories of the Senate that the United States should pay these bonds, because by reason of any act of Congress a moral obligation had been created; but my committee saw no reason why we should pay the remainder of the debts of the counties.

* * * * * * *

The people would not have had to pay them but for the act of Congress.

So that Congress went on record at that time as declaring that there was a moral obligation on the part of the Government to take care of the obligation that the people would not have had to bear except through the act of Congress, passed in 1897, as I have indicated.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. If I understand what the Senator has just read, it was Senator Beveridge who declared that.

Mr. BRATTON. And the Congress passed the act.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Will not the Senator explain why there is any moral obligation on the part of the United States to pay bonds issued in apparent good faith by these counties, on which the counties got the money, and on which the United States Government got no money?

Mr. BRATTON. It is this: That the bonds were void, because they were in contravention of an act of Congress, and the people never were compelled to pay them under the law as it then existed, and would never have had to pay them except for an arbitrary act of Congress passed thereafter.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I see that. The Senator speaks of moral obligation. It seems to me the moral obligation rests upon the community that got the money by selling the bonds.

Mr. BRATTON. The money went into railroad construction, and the bondholders came to Congress and persuaded Congress to take their view of the situation, and to arbitrarily fix a liability upon counties and a town that they were not obligated to bear under existing law. The Congress, in the enabling act, declared itself in favor of the Congress relieving them from a moral obligation that Congress had arbitrarily placed upon them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from New Mexico has expired. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. I would like to have the Senator answer in my time as to whether the railroad was actually constructed?

Mr. BRATTON. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. The railroad was built?

Mr. BRATTON. The railroads were built.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, the Territory could not issue any bonds, and could not authorize any county to issue bonds. That would be a matter entirely in the control of Congress.

Mr. BRATTON. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. Bonds were issued, and the local community got the railroad, and then Congress came along and validated the bonds.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It seems to me that the Federal Government is playing insurer for everybody, and is the loser in the whole transaction. The community got the money and got the railroad, the bondholders got paid, and now we are to furnish the means whereby all that is made possible. I do not see why the United States should pay.

Mr. BRATTON. I appreciate that we are operating under the five-minute rule——

Mr. FLETCHER. I take my time to suggest that what the Senator is now proposing is not a funding of all these bonds, or reimbursement for all the bonds, but only for the amount of money which the community spent in cash outside of the bond issue. Whether I am correct about that I am not sure.

Mr. BRATTON. The amount of the debt that the counties and the town have paid is now $397,502. The bill merely grants land to reimburse them for that sum of money. The bill was reported unanimously by the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, the committee feeling that there was a moral obligation to make reimbursement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

MINERAL ROYALTIES

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8831) to provide for the collection of fees from royalties on production of minerals from leased Indian lands.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

RETIREMENT OF CIVIL-SERVICE EMPLOYEES

Mr. DALE. Mr. President, I was hoping that we might reach Calendar No. 684, Senate bill 1727, to amend the act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service." We will not reach it this morning, but so that there may be no misunderstanding about it, I want to state that it is a very conservative bill, similar to one which the Senate has twice passed before, and at the first opportunity I am going to move to take it up.

JOHN W. STOCKETT

The bill (S. 2319) for the relief of John W. Stockett was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES. I would like to have some explanation of that bill. It carries a large amount of money.

Mr. CARAWAY. The explanation is this: An employee in the department made an invention which the Government has used, and by its use it has saved, according to its contention, very large sums of money. But under the department's contention the man has no legal claim.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 3555) to establish a Federal farm board to aid in the orderly marketing and in the control and disposition of the surplus of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas has the floor.

Mr. CARAWAY. I was desirous of concluding my statement with reference to the bill just before the Senate, unless the Chair holds that it now goes back to the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill may not be considered, but the Senator may conclude his speech.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the bill may not be considered, I do not care to consume the time of the Senate further.

REIMBURSEMENT TO STATE OF CONNECTICUT

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may I have the attention of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY]? Would the Senator be willing to ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for a moment in order that Calendar No. 562, the bill (S. 3117) for the relief of the State of Connecticut, which we were about to reach on the call of the calendar, might be considered? I will say to the Senator that the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] asked several times that the bill go over but has now withdrawn his objection to it, and I do not think there will be any objection. If it leads to debate I shall withdraw my request.

Mr. McNARY. Under that statement I am willing to grant the request of the Senator from Connecticut.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3117) for the relief of the State of Connecticut, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the State of Connecticut, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $559,373.40, for and on account of advances and expenditures made by said State in the War of 1812 to 1815 with Great Britain.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator state the purpose briefly?

Mr. BINGHAM. This is a claim by the State of Connecticut for expenditures made during the War of 1812, of a like character to that which has already been granted the States of Maryland, South Carolina, New York, and Delaware, and the city of Baltimore.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What is the amount?

Mr. BINGHAM. The amount is stated by the comptroller, in his report to the Senate, as about half a million dollars.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I understand there is some question about how we shall proceed the rest of the afternoon. I think we had better wait until that is determined before we act on this measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the unfinished business was laid before the Senate and then laid aside simply for the consideration of Calendar No. 562.

Mr. JONES. As I understand, there is some doubt whether we will go on with the unfinished business this afternoon. Possibly if that is not done we will have a call of the calendar, and in that way would reach the bill of the Senator from Connecticut in a very few moments.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, there is no doubt about the ability of those in charge of the unfinished business to go forward with it for a time at least. I simply yielded to the Senator from Connecticut momentarily with the understanding that there would be no objection to the consideration of his bill.

Mr. JONES. With that statement, I am perfectly willing that the Senator from Connecticut shall proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CULVERTS AND TRESTLES AT CAMP M'CLELLAN, ALA.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, from the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 5590) to authorize appropriations for construction of culverts and trestles in connection with the camp railroad at Camp McClellan, Ala., and I submit a report (No. 747) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the purpose of purchasing the necessary materials and hiring the necessary labor to construct or repair culverts and trestles and other parts of the camp railroad at Camp McClellan, as in the opinion of the Secretary of War may be necessary, a sum not to exceed $19,830.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, may I ask if this is in connection with a military reservation?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; it is. I would like to state that the Secretary of War reported on it favorably. It passed the House and has the approval of the Committee on Military Affairs. The Secretary of War states that if the appropriation is not made the property will be damaged for lack of repairs.

Mr. JONES. It is Government property?

Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, yes.

Mr. BLACK. It is Government property.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FARM RELIEF

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3555) to establish a Federal farm board to aid in the orderly marketing and in the control and disposition of the surplus of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the pending amendment is one which I introduced the other day. I have since discussed the matter with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY]. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment which I offered and to present in its place another amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is at liberty to perfect his amendment at any time. The proposed amendment will be stated.

4. The words "agricultural commodity" mean an agricultural commodity which is nonperishable in its nature.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator kindly state the difference between the amendment now offered and the one which he has withdrawn?

Mr. COPELAND. The other amendment apparently did not cover the entire problem contemplated under the bill. There is one section, section 7, where provision is made for marketing associations. The amendment which I offered the other day did not cover them, but the amendment now offered takes out of the bill fruits and vegetables entirely.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. All perishable products?

Mr. COPELAND. All perishable products are removed. It puts the language in a part of the bill where it does not mar the general features of the bill or interfere with its high purpose. The amendment, if adopted, will protect the apple growers and other fruit growers and take care of all perishable products.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, what is a perishable product—a product that lasts for a year or a year and a half?

Mr. COPELAND. I do not think there is any difference of opinion as to the definition.

Mr. DILL. Why should not the bill say "fruits and vegetables," and then there could not be any doubt about it? If we are going to amend it to clarify it, it seems to me we ought to say that it is not intended to include fruits and vegetables. Apples last about as long as potatoes nowadays.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I would suggest, in line with what my colleague has stated, that apples are kept now for practically a year. Of course, they have to be kept in refrigeration. I agree with what my colleague has stated. I have had a great many telegrams and letters protesting against apples being included within the terms of the bill. I have conferred with the Senator from Oregon, and I understand the position of the Senator is that he does not think they are really covered by the bill, but I think it is well that we should make it perfectly clear.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I would ask that the amendment be read or explained.

Mr. McNARY. May I state that it is proposed by the Senator from New York as a substitute, the previous amendment having been withdrawn?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Did I understand the Senator from Oregon to say he had accepted the amendment?

Mr. McNARY. No; the Senator from New York is simply perfecting his proposal.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Has the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry taken any position on the amendment?

Mr. McNARY. None whatsoever. I presume action will be taken on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am just as anxious as the two Senators from Washington and the Senator from Massachusetts to make clear exactly what the bill means, because the apple growers of my State are very much concerned about it. Having consulted with the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL], may I present the amendment in still another form, that in the general definition section 4 shall read:

The words "agricultural commodity" mean an agricultural commodity which is not a fruit or vegetable in its natural state or processed.

Mr. BORAH. I have a very earnest protest from the potato growers of my State. That would not cover potatoes, would it?

Mr. McNARY. A protest against the inclusion of potatoes in the bill?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. I think that language would take potatoes out of the bill. The language of section 5 takes all those products out of the bill because they are not sufficiently durable and have not the proper characteristics to enable them to be kept any length of time. I have desired, so far as I could, to remove any doubt that is in the mind of any Senator about such matters. There are several proposals and I think that we will consider them and work them out to meet the situation.

Mr. COPELAND. Am I to understand the Senator from Idaho that he objects to having potatoes taken out of the bill?

Mr. BORAH. I had a letter from a constituent of mine this morning very seriously doubting the wisdom of including potatoes. I had not thought about it. As I am not going to vote for the bill, I did not feel that I had much to say about perfecting it. I simply asked if the Senator's amendment would cover potatoes.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; it would. It would exclude potatoes from the operation of the bill, as it would all fruits and vegetables.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Oregon that I also have received protests from apple growers in my State insisting that apples be left out of the bill.

Mr. McNARY. I think we will have no difficulty in complying with the request of the junior Senator from Montana.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I simply want to say that I hope very much we may be able to agree upon a general amendment by which no product could be brought under the the terms of the bill without the consent of a board representing that industry.

Mr. BORAH. What is the Senator's idea about electing or selecting the board? I ask that for the reason that it is one of the subjects which has created some doubt in my mind?

Mr. SIMMONS. The council which I had in mind would be appointed by the President, on the recommendation of the board provided for, and confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Oregon if the Senator's committee intends to pass judgment upon the amendment submitted by the Senator from New York?

Mr. McNARY. Not for committee action. On the floor of the Senate I think we shall have no difficulty in taking care of it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It is likely to come to a vote on the floor?

Mr. McNARY. Probably to-day; though I do not know.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I thought probably the Senator from Oregon would accept the amendment.

Mr. McNARY. I am going to accept an amendment that is generally agreeable. There may be some difference of opinion about it. I am satisfied with the one offered by the Senator from New York. There may be some modifications, but I do not want to consider those until we seriously take up the amendment for earnest consideration.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think the Senator's amendment simply provides that agricultural commodities shall not include nonperishable products. That is all he asks. That is a general definition of the term. I understand the Senator from Oregon is agreeable to that.

Mr. McNARY. Yes. I think, however, the Senator from New York has changed that language by suggesting the substitution of the words "fruits and vegetables."

Mr. COPELAND. At the suggestion of both Senators from Washington, who wished to make it very specific, I have changed the definition so as to exclude from the operation of the bill all fruits and vegetables in their natural state or processed so that there will then be no question that the interests represented by the Senator from Florida, as well as the apple people, will be entirely satisfied.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I have recognized from the beginning that we have an agricultural problem. There never has been any doubt in my mind about it. I have also recognized a well-defined desire to attack the problem and solve it properly. My own conception of it is that it is a matter of too great a spread between the price received by the producer and the price paid by the consumer. I do not hesitate to say that I would not knowingly vote for a bill which would increase further the cost of living. It does seem to me, however, that of the amount the consumer pays the producer does not get an equitable share. If we could reach that problem, which lies in the marketing, and could reduce the spread between the producer and the consumer, that would be wholly legitimate and ought to be done.

The bill which was passed in the last Congress had very objectionable features to me. I pointed out my objections in detail when that measure was under discussion. There has been since the action upon that bill and the veto of the President an honest effort, I think, to get together. To those who differed as to the remedy but who believed that there was a problem, it appears that progress has been made. This bill does not include the objectionable feature in reference to the appointment of the board. The change is a good one. The bill does not limit the operation of the law to a few commodities; it has been broadened so that the charge of discrimination that has sometimes been made does not now lie. However, I am of the opinion that the change in covering all commodities, while it answers the objection of discrimination, will really make the bill weaker in its actual operation. When I read the powers intrusted to the board which is to have control of agricultural products, it seems to me that nothing has been omitted from the control of the Government. That is one feature that, while it was intended to cure the defect of discrimination, does have in it a weakness, as I see it.

There was a feature in the bill as previously presented that is not so prominent in this one, but it is still contained in it, as I see it. I refer to putting of the Government in the business of buying and selling. There has been an effort made to show that that is not the case, but on examination, paragraph (d), on page 12, and also paragraph (e), on page 12, there is no doubt, in my mind, that the Government is to enter into agreements with marketing associations that will put it in the position of party of the first part, and in reality give it control of buying and selling. The previous bill, I think, was clearly a price-fixing measure, although its author questioned that it was, and other proponents of the bill also rather denied that it was of that character, I will say to my friend the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], who has been very fair in his presentation of the bill, and who, as I know, has worked assiduously in attempting to frame a bill for which we all could vote, that I think, while on page 12 a statement is made to the effect that prices shall not be fixed, yet price fixing is involved. This is the language to which I refer:

> The price at which a surplus or any part thereof is to be purchased or disposed of under any marketing agreement shall not be fixed in such agreement, but all such purchases and disposals shall be made subject to the prevailing competitive conditions of the markets in which they occur.

There is a statement which on its face seems to negative the charge that this is a price fixing bill; it states that the price will not be fixed; but when we reach the question of how losses are to be made up, we find this language:

> SEC. 8. (a) In order to carry out marketing and nonpremium insurance agreements in respect of any agricultural commodity without loss to the revolving fund, each marketed unit of such agricultural commodity shall, throughout any marketing period in respect of such commodity, contribute ratably its equitable share of the losses, costs, and charges.

Costs and charges may be easily determined; there is no doubt about that; but losses immediately become an indeterminate factor, and I can not understand how the Government agency can be responsible for making up the losses unless it knows something about the price at which a commodity is purchased and the price at which it is sold. If the agency is both the purchaser and the seller, then, certainly the price is fixed when the purchase is made. That point, I think my friend must admit, is in the bill. Otherwise the losses could not be estimated.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McNARY. Clearly in this measure there is no price fixing in language or in purpose. However, Mr. President, it must be admitted, if the board determines to enter into the marketing of products with cooperative organizations, for the purpose of stabilization, and removes from the domestic market the surplus, that which remains for domestic consumption would naturally go to the top of the tariff wall; that would be the economic effect of supply and demand when the surplus is removed. If making the tariff effective may be called price fixing, then all our legislation with respect to the tariff is price fixing; and one of the purposes of the bill is to make the tariff effective as to agriculture.

When the board undertakes through cooperative organizations to acquire the surplus and relieve the depression in the price level thus caused, the price naturally will ascend to the point where the commodity is protected by the tariff wall. Any one who has knowledge of economic laws knows to that extent it is price influencing. If it is price fixing, it is making the tariff effective; and if the Senator has any objection to making the tariff effective as to agricultural products of which there is a surplus, then he is speaking on behalf of other industry and against the best interests of agriculture; and I do not think that is his position.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, we have had experience with price fixing. We had such an experience during the war, and we want to forget it just as quickly as we can. Other countries have had similar experience. Brazil has had it in the case of the valorization of coffee, and the plan broke down. Great Britain had it up to last week in the price control of rubber, and that attempt broke down. In the case of various commodities of which certain countries have more or less of a monopoly, price fixing attempts have been made by the government, but in every case, so far as I know, the efforts have been abandoned.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. I should like to ask the Senator a question. While he says the undertakings to which he refers have broken down, have they not in each case brought prosperity to agriculture in the countries affected, or that part of agriculture which produced the particular commodities?

Mr. FESS. Temporarily that is always the case.

Mr. BROOKHART. Some temporary prosperity would feel very good to the farmer now.

Mr. FESS. I do not think that my good friend would agree that a momentary stimulus that would result in a period of nausea later on would be a good thing.

Mr. BROOKHART. The condition of agriculture could not be made worse.

Mr. FESS. In other words, medicine which will stimulate for a minute may ultimately kill the patient, and that is the thing we ought to avoid.

Mr. BROOKHART. Perhaps agriculture would get enough out of it to provide for decent burial; it is dead now.

Mr. FESS. I do not think the Senator is very sincere in that statement.

So much for the price-fixing idea. Now I want the attention of my friend the Senator from Oregon, the author of the bill, to paragraph f, page 13, which, if I understand it correctly, presents, I think, a serious problem. I read as follows:

(f) During a marketing period fixed by the board for any commodity, the board may enter into marketing agreements for the purchase, withholding, and disposal of the food products of such commodity, and all provisions of this section applicable to marketing agreements for the purchase, withholding, and disposal of a surplus of the commodity, shall apply to the agreements in respect of its food products.

This is the situation as it appears to me: The purpose of this measure, definitely stated, is to lift the domestic price to a plane that seems to be reasonable; in other words, we are hoping by this proposed legislation to prevent the price of American agricultural products descending to the level of the price in the world's market. If that be not the purpose of the measure, I do not understand it. In other words, economically it has been stated that the surplus determines the price of the home product; that if we have 800,000,000 bushels of wheat and can only consume here at home 600,000,000 bushels, the surplus of 200,000,000 bushels will have to be sold elsewhere than in the home market; and if the price at which that surplus is sold is lower than what is reasonable here at home, it will bring the home price down to what that price is. We are trying to avoid that. That, I understand, is the purpose of this legislation.

If that be true, if we want to maintain the home price above the level of the world price, and this measure is designed to do that, the purpose of the legislation is to keep up the price; and if our purpose is to keep up the price and the proposed legislation extends to food products the same as to raw materials, then the effort to maintain the price of wheat will apply to the food products of wheat; it will to flour and also to bread. If the purpose of paragraph (f) is to apply the proposed legislation to food products, then we are here legislating to maintain the price of flour in the hands of the miller, for wheat is not flour until it gets to the miller, and we are undertaking to maintain the price of bread in the hands of the baker, for flour is not bread until it reaches the baker. So I am forced to the conclusion that in most specific language this measure proposes to authorize the Government to maintain the price of flour for the miller and bread for the baker. I do not think that the miller or the baker has any claim upon the Government to maintain a price above what the competitive conditions establish. If competitive conditions will operate, then this is unnecessary. So it is a serious problem with me if I am called upon to legislate to maintain above a certain level the price of food products when it is a guaranty only to the people who do not need the guaranty, and at the expense of the ultimate consumer.

I read that again:

During a marketing period fixed by the board for any commodity—

That is wheat—

the board may enter into marketing agreements for the purchase, withholding, and disposal of the food products—

That is pork. The food product of hogs is pork; and if the Government is maintaining the price of pork, it is supporting the packers, for it is not pork until the packers get through with it; and we are called upon here to legislate to maintain the price of the food that we use on behalf of the processors, who are the millers and the packers. I will not vote for a measure that will include that.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I think the Senator's observation is very well timed. There is merit in it.

Mr. FESS. If I am wrong, I want it pointed out.

Mr. BROOKHART. But I want to call the Senator's attention to the amendment I have offered, in which the cost of production plus 5 per cent profit price is paid to the farmer himself; and when these products are bought from the packers they are only bought on the condition that the packers will pay the cost of production with 5 per cent capital return added.

Mr. FESS. Does the Senator think he has an amendment that will cure that?

Mr. BROOKHART. I think so. I think my amendment cures it. My amendment has not any support yet. I do not know whether it is a substitute——

Mr. FESS. Certainly my interpretation of this paragraph is not wrong.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think the Senator is correct in that interpretation.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, this is the same argument that the Senator made last year, with which I wholly disagreed. There are two or three amendments pending that may clarify the situation, which I shall discuss at the present time.

Mr. FESS. I want the Senator to understand that I am not squeamish about the thing. I am trying to get at it, and the Senator knows that I have been very anxious that we might get a bill we could all support.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, the Senator realizes that we can not buy hogs to affect the price of hogs or the price of pork. This board can not buy hogs.

Mr. FESS. The board is not doing anything. The board is making agreements with certain associations to do it; and the Government itself, speaking through the board, is the party of the first part and becomes responsible for it. That is one objection that I have to the bill. If the bill left it to voluntary marketing associations, I would vote for it; but it does not do that. The proponents of the bill say that that would not be effective; that the only way to do it is to put the Government back of it. My good friend from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] takes that view and the proponents of this bill take that view. That is not economic, and it is not necessary.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If the Senator will permit me, if the economics of the bill is correct at all, if it is to affect the price of hogs, it must be reflected through the price of pork. If you are going to take pork off the market in order to raise the price of hogs, you can keep pork. You can not keep hogs, because they will eat so much that you can not afford to keep them. A hog must be sold and slaughtered when he is ready to go to the slaughtering pen. You can not buy up hogs and store them away.

Mr. FESS. Does the Senator think that it is ever necessary to buy pork and withhold it from the market in order to keep up the price? Is not the price of pork high enough? Is there any reason in the world why great organizations like the packers, which sell the great majority of pounds of pork, should be protected by Government decree?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am not talking about the packers. I am talking about the price of hogs.

Mr. FESS. The Senator is talking about the food product of hogs.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And we are exporting pork all the time.

Mr. FESS. Who is exporting pork?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The United States.

Mr. FESS. Yes; the packers are.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. FESS. That is the point. If the Senator wants to do that, all right. I do not.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator claim that the price of pork has nothing to do with the price of hogs?

Mr. FESS. Oh, certainly; the price of hogs has most to do with the price of pork.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. What I am trying to find out is how the Senator is going to apply this bill unless he finds it necessary to buy pork.

Mr. FESS. I should be perfectly willing to vote for a measure that gives the marketing associations the power to withhold from the market the stock they buy.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The hogs?

Mr. FESS. Yes; the livestock and wheat, and so on.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. You can hold wheat from the market, but you can not hold cattle and hogs from the market.

Mr. FESS. Why not?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Because they will eat you out of your place. When they are ready to be slaughtered they must be slaughtered. You can not keep them all winter.

Mr. FESS. Certainly; but an association can maintain hogs as well as the raiser of hogs can, can it not?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Wheat does not eat; but hogs and cattle eat, and you can not afford to keep them.

Mr. FESS. That is a very remarkable discovery that the Senator has made.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator from Ohio evidently finds this a new idea. It is remarkable to the Senator from Ohio, and that is why I find it necessary to tell him that he can not keep hogs and cattle beyond a certain period of time, because they will eat.

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Minnesota has never lived on a farm. He does not know anything about what he is talking about. I lived on a farm. I know that when you market hogs it does not necessarily mean that you have to have a fixed date. I admit that after you have gotten them to the marketing stage it is better to put them off, of course.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. You have to.

Mr. FESS. You do not have to. You can sell a hog that is 9 months old, or you can sell one that is 12 months old, or you can sell one that is 15 months old, or you can sell one that is 2 years old. You can sell a calf when it is a calf, or you can sell it when it is a year old, or you can sell it when it is 2 years old, or you can sell it when it is 3 years old.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. BROOKHART. When they have eaten up all your money, and you can not borrow any more at the bank, you have to sell them.

Mr. FESS. My friend from Iowa knows that what I am saying is true. The Senator from Minnesota does not, but the Senator from Iowa does know.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Let me make just one observation to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. All right.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. He can keep a steer for 20 years if he has a big enough bank account to buy the food for him. Of course he does not have to sell.

Mr. FESS. When is the marketable time for cattle?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. When they are finished.

Mr. FESS. When are they finished?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. You can ask any boy on the farm and he will tell you.

Mr. FESS. But the Senator can not tell me.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes; I can tell the Senator.

Mr. FESS. No; the Senator can not.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am sure the Senator does not take his own question seriously.

Mr. FESS. Yes; the Senator does. The Senator from Minnesota has an idea that the Senator from Ohio knows nothing about the farm. He is assuming that because the Senator from Ohio at one time left the farm to do some professional work; but I want to say to my friend that the people who refer to these Senators as "high-hatters" do not know what they are talking about.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I would never accuse the Senator of that. I am only accusing the Senator of assuming some things when there is no basis for the assumption.

Mr. FESS. I do not want to take the time of the Senate unduly. I decided just to make a brief statement, but I see that I am going to get into this thing, and I do not want to.

Mr. President, as I stated before, if the operations of this bill were limited to the marketing associations, I would vote for it. There would be one or two amendments that I should like to offer, but if they were not adopted it would not be serious. I should be willing to vote for the bill without them. The bill carries another feature that is compulsory, however, and that is not only objectionable on the ground that it is unworkable but it is objectionable on the ground that I do not believe it will ever pass the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. McNARY. What is that?

Mr. FESS. That is the equalization fee.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he passes to the discussion of the equalization fee?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator mentioned the fact that he was opposed to the Government getting behind these cooperative associations. As I remember, the Senator voted for the Esch-Cummins railroad bill.

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. BROOKHART. In that bill the Government not only got behind the return of the railroads——

Mr. FESS. Only for six months.

Mr. BROOKHART. Well, it did it for six months, and that cost us $529,000,000. If I could get that much, I could start a pretty big export corporation.

Mr. FESS. There ought to be some clarification here. The Government had held the roads for about 26 months under an agreement that when they were returned they would be returned in as good condition as when they were taken over; and when we passed them back under private control we did write in the bill a provision for a guaranty up to six months.

Mr. BROOKHART. But that was not returning the roads in as good condition as they were. It was over and above that. It was paying war-time profits to the roads for that six months, and it cost us $529,000,000.

Mr. FESS. It was stated, however, that the roads would be the loser in the transaction, and I assumed that they were; but when it comes to the transportation act of 1920, outside of the six months, the Government is not back of any guaranty, as the Senator knows.

Mr. BROOKHART. Not out of the Treasury; but the Government wrote into the law rules for valuation, and then it wrote into the law a command to the Interstate Commerce Commission to give them a rate of return on the people of the country of 5¾ per cent.

Mr. FESS. Oh, no; oh, no! It just expressed an opinion; and the commission has never done that.

Mr. BROOKHART. The law says that it shall do it.

Mr. FESS. The commission has never done it.

Mr. BROOKHART. It has tried to do it.

Mr. FESS. If it were a guaranty, then the Government would have to make it up, as it never has and never will.

Mr. BROOKHART. It is not a guaranty out of the Treasury, of course, but it is a guaranty out of the people's pockets.

Mr. FESS. The Senator and I do not agree at all on that item, as is very apparent. The railroads are a public utility and perform a public function and are therefore subject to Government regulation. The railroads are not regulated to increase the cost to the public. The railroads are regulated to keep down the cost to the public. Here is legislation that touches subjects not public, and the purpose is to elevate the price.

Mr. BROOKHART. Let me ask the Senator, did not the Government regard farm products as a public utility, and did not the Government take over wheat and make a profit out of wheat?

Mr. FESS. No; the Government did not regard it as a public utility at all.

Mr. BROOKHART. It took it over, the same as it did the railroads, and it fixed prices of nearly everything else, so that they were practically determined by Government regulation.

Mr. FESS. As the Senators knows, that was purely an emergency measure, in war time, not because it was the subject of legislation, but it was a protective measure on the part of the Government.

Mr. BROOKHART. After the war was over we proceeded to guaranty for six months the profits to the railroads out of the Treasury.

Mr. FESS. That was to keep our contract with the railroads.

Mr. BROOKHART. That was not provided in the act taking over the roads.

Mr. FESS. We could talk until doomsday, and the Senator from Iowa and I would never approach one another on that question.

I want to present a situation now which I think obtains in regard to this bill that is very objectionable. If we operate the equalization fee on corn, in order to maintain a price higher than that in the world market, then we will have corn raised in America, fed to American hogs, at a certain price, and sold under the direction of the board to Canada at the world price, which would be lower. Otherwise there is nothing to it. The lower-priced American corn sold to Canada would be fed in Canada to hogs, and be marketed in the same market where American hogs are marketed. I think that is wholly unfair, and it seems to me it will work havoc when we come to see its operation.

Mr. BROOKHART. In regard to that, in the first place, there is a tariff on corn of only 15 cents a bushel. If we can raise corn under the tariff there is not much relief. By an amendment I have offered to this bill we propose to try to improve the world market for corn, as the Canadians have improved the world market for wheat.

Mr. FESS. I have not examined the Senator's amendment, but I shall be glad to study it. The feature to which I have just referred is inequitable, unjust, and will prove itself rather harmful to the American hog raisers.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. If the tariff on corn were effective, then, at the present time, the Canadian farmer would be able to buy his corn cheaper than it could be bought in America, would he not?

Mr. FESS. Buy it from other countries?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. So that would not alter the situation, really, as far as the Canadian hog raiser is concerned.

Mr. FESS. No; other than this: That corn raised in the United States would be sold on the same plane with the corn raised in other countries from which Canada would buy. My only point was that you are making a discrimination against the man who feeds high-priced corn in the United States, in favor of the man who feeds the lower-priced corn in Canada.

Mr. WHEELER. But if the tariff on corn is of any benefit to the farmer, it would have exactly that effect at present.

Mr. FESS. The Senator knows the tariff does not apply to exports. The tariff is applicable only to imports, and we are talking about exports to Canada. If that is not true, then there is nothing in the bill.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. GOODING. Surely we are going to raise the price of American corn to Canada. There is no doubt about that. We do not export corn, to commence with, or so little that it amounts to nothing at all. It is not in the class of wheat or hogs at all. It is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. FESS. Then in the name of common sense, if we do not export corn, why apply the equalization fee to corn?

Mr. BROOKHART. Because we export corn through hogs. That is the reason. Canada will not buy any cheaper corn.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, this is a fine illustration of the remarkable acumen of the Senator from Idaho. He wants to place the equalization fee upon corn in order to lift the American price above the world price in the markets to which we export corn, and then turns about and says we do not export any corn. Then why should we apply the equalization fee to it?

Mr. BROOKHART. We do export corn, but it is a small proportion of the yield.

Mr. FESS. In reference to the equalization fee, I hold that the equalization fee is not workable. I am perfectly frank in saying that the theory of the equalization fee is good. If it could be worked, and were constitutional, it would seem sound economically, for the theory is that if you have legislation on behalf of the producer, to save him from losses, then whatever loss the producer will suffer ought to come from the persons benefited by the law. I think that is equitable, and if it would work it would be economical; but I do not think it would work at all.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH I can not agree with the last statement of the Senator. One of my objections to this bill is that the proponents have singled out the farmer and imposed upon him an equalization fee in order that he may get what is said to be the other end of the protective tariff, while the manufacturer gets his protection without any fee at all.

Mr. FESS. That is true. What I had in mind was that the theory is that this legislation is on behalf of the producer. If any loss comes to the producer from selling at a lower price in the export market, that loss ought to be suffered by the man who is benefited by the law. That is what I meant, that if this could be done, it ought to be done; but I agree with the Senator that it is singling out one enterprise of the country and not applying to others.

Mr. BORAH. At the present time the farmer is paying about one-third of his income less other expenses to meet his taxes, a proportion which no other industry in the country approaches. And at the same time there is to be added a special burden in addition to his already disproportionate tax before he can have remedial legislation.

Mr. FESS. And he can not add it to his price.

Mr. BORAH. And it is a fact that the taxes are increasing about every 10 years sufficiently to take all the possible profits that he can make out of his crops.

Mr. FESS. That is true.

Mr. BORAH. What I can not understand—and I say this in the utmost good faith—is why it is not perfectly just and equitable to make an appropriation for the purpose of testing the value of this experiment. Who else comes to Congress asking for remedial legislation and is told that they must be especially charged for it? Would the Senator support an appropriation for the purpose of determining whether or not the theory upon which the marketing agreement rests is sound?

Mr. FESS. I think I would not.

Mr. WHEELER. The question raised with me would be as to the constitutionality of the proposition.

Mr. FESS. I doubt very much whether that would be constitutional.

Mr. BORAH. I know that question has been raised, but I would like to have somebody show me an authority where the Congress of the United States has ever been called to order by the Supreme Court of the United States for making a general appropriation for what it conceived to be in the public interest.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio let me clear up a little my remarks on not exporting corn?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GOODING. I think it is generally conceded that we export so little that it is not considered a factor, as far as that is concerned, in the 3,000,000,000 bushels we produce.

Mr. FESS. I think the Senator is right in that.

Mr. GOODING. The corn people do not expect to get any benefit from the export of corn. It comes through the hogs. We feed all of our corn, practically, to the hog in America, and there comes the farmer's benefit. Unless he can get a benefit in that way we can not help the corn producers at all.

Mr. FESS. I oppose the equalization fee, and could not vote for any bill that has the equalization fee in it; first, because I think without doubt it is not constitutional, and there is no question about the bill getting before the Supreme Court in due time if it becomes a law. Of course, a lot of people say: "That is not for us to determine. Let it be passed, and let it go to the Supreme Court." I do not believe that is quite the level on which we ought to place legislation in the Senate.

Then I am quite confident that it is not workable, for if you are to apply the equalization fee you must make it applicable to all. You can not make fowl of one and fish of the other. In order to operate it you will have to build up a bureau, which I fear will cost more to manage than will be the profit to come to the people who are beneficiaries of the law.

I know it is stated here that it is to be collected through transportation or through the processor or through the purchaser. Then if that be true—and I assume it would be—you can not leave it to the word of the thousands of purchasers or processors or transporters as to whether it is paid or not. If you do not have this Government function administered by a Government bureau, it will be wholly unworkable, and if you handle it by a Government bureau, then the price that will be paid to the bureau to operate it will be undoubtedly large in proportion to what will be saved as a benefit to the producer.

Not only that, but the whole thing is a guess, nothing more than a guess. The board under the bill will before this is to become operative estimate for any commodity what the probable losses will be. How on earth can anybody estimate what the probable losses will be on any crop before the crop is marketed? If you are going to make it a mere guess, how are you going to finance it? The bill says that these marketing associations can be financed out of the stabilization fund without the payment of interest. That means that there is no limit to the stabilization fund. There is a limit in that the bill provides it shall not exceed the revolving fund, which is $250,000,000. But if in the operation of this bill we find that the original authorization of $250,000,000 is not sufficient to operate it and there is a demand on Congress to increase the authorization what will be the outcome of it?

There is no limit as to what we will be called upon to appropriate in order to operate this bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, my friend, the Senator from Montana, was of the opinion a moment ago that the proposition which I suggested would be unconstitutional. I want to ask, Is not that principle in the bill now? We are now asked to make an appropriation of $250,000,000.

Mr. WHEELER. That is in the nature of a loan; that is not in the nature of a direct appropriation to be turned over to pay the farmer something.

Mr. BORAH. How can you take something out of the Treasury of the United States and loan it to private individuals for the purpose of carrying on business any more than you can make a direct appropriation out of the Treasury for their benefit? I think the same principle is in this bill. I do not say that renders the bill unconstitutional. I do not contend that it does, because in my opinion the courts have gone so far in sustaining the action of Congress in regard to those things that I do not think it vulnerable to a constitutional question, but the same principle is here now that would be in the other proposition.

Mr. WHEELER. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. FESS. I would like to have the Senator's opinion on another matter that I will call his attention to, which suggested the question of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. The impression I meant to convey was that the opponents of the bill are now contending that even a loan to the farmer is unconstitutional. That is one of their objections to it. The Senator from Idaho says that instead of lending money and having them pay it back by an equalization fee, why not just appropriate the money out of the Treasury of the United States and give it to them? The purpose of the equalization fee is to get away from that very thing. As far as I am personally concerned, I am sure that I would support the Senator's suggestion if it could be carried out, but I am sure you would get no place in the Senate with a proposal for a direct appropriation of money that was never to be paid back.

Mr. BORAH. Upon what theory could the Senate discriminate with reference to the appropriation in the face of the multitude of appropriations which it is constantly making in the same line of action?

Mr. WHEELER. I think the Senator is absolutely right on the proposition that we are constantly appropriating money, but there is no one that rises in the Senate and raises his voice to say that "the appropriation for this thing or that thing is unconstitutional." But it seems that when the question of agriculture comes up and we seek to appropriate money for that purpose every lawyer gets up and immediately says the proposition is unconstitutional. We authorized the other day, for instance, an appropriation of money running into the millions for flood relief. No one ever even looked into the constitutionality of the question, and we passed it by without even giving it a serious thought.

Mr. GOODING, Mr. SHORTRIDGE, and Mr. TYDINGS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I should like to claim the floor just a moment in my own behalf, and then I shall be glad to yield.

I call attention to a statement of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] in reply to a question of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. There is a provision in section 10 of the bill called the insurance provision. I ask the Senator's attention to whether this is a loan or not. The insurance is an obligation to insure the associations against a loss by being compelled to sell what they buy at a lower price than they paid for it when it was delivered. That has been one of the big questions. If marketing associations go out at harvest time and buy up at a price they decide upon and then ultimately a slump comes and the market price is below what they paid and no chance exists for them to get a higher price, there is an inevitable loss. Section 10 of the bill is to insure against that loss.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield right at that point?

Mr. FESS. Not now. There is a stabilization fund created in the bill. That is made up first by advances from a revolving fund in the way of a loan; secondly, by repayment of those advances; and, third, by the fees assessed through the equalization-fee plan. The only item that makes it revolve or self-supporting would be the fee paid under the equalization-fee plan. That is paid by the producer. But the provision for insurance is applicable to both premium members and nonpremium members. Let me read it. I want the Senator's attention to this, because it is extremely important. It reads as follows:

(c) Whenever in the judgment of the board the use of such insurance agreements in respect of any commodity will stabilize the market substantially in the interest of the producers of the commodity, whether or not members of a cooperative association dealing in the commodity, then the board, during the continuance of any marketing period for the commodity as provided in section 7, may enter into nonpremium, or if the board deems it advisable, premium insurance agreements with cooperative associations dealing in the commodity. Whenever in the judgment of the board the use of such insurance agreements will not so stabilize the market, then the board may enter into premium insurance agreements only with the cooperative associations.

So that the premiums paid by the owner who insures will create a fund out of which can be paid all losses. It is an insurance. It applies not only to the member of the association who pays the premium, but there is a provision for nonpremium insurance. There is no possibility of a fund created in the insurance when the person pays no premium. Now what will be done?

Payments required under nonpremium insurance agreements in respect of any commodity shall be made out of the stabilization fund for the commodity.

Here is a provision in the bill that assesses upon every producer nonmember of the association to support the association in order that the association may be able to go on with the contract. It is identical to assessing a fee upon every laboring man in the country to support a union of which he is not a member. While I believe in labor unions and believe in the membership of a labor union supporting the union, I never could be brought to believe that it is justice to assess any fee upon those who do not belong to the union to support the union. Neither do I believe that a producer not belonging to an association can properly be assessed to maintain the association. That should be limited to members of the association. Such a provision is in the bill, and that is not a loan. That is a payment out of the stabilization fund. How do we create the stabilization fund? By loan from the revolving fund and the fees that come in from the equalization fee; and yet we take it out of that fund to pay the nonpremium insurance.

I yield now to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator from Idaho just a moment ago asked for some case showing the Supreme Court limitation on appropriations made by Congress. I would like to refer the Senator to the case of Dobbins v. the Commissioners of Erie County (16 Pet. pp. 448–449), where Justice Wayne, delivering the unanimous opinion of the court, said in the opinion:

The revenue of the United States is intended by the Constitution to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; to be expended, in particular, in carrying into effect the laws made to execute all the express powers, "and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States."

Again Chief Justice Chase, delivering the opinion of the court in the case of Veazie Bank v. Fenno (8 Wall. 541, U. S. Repts.), said:

There are, indeed, certain virtual limitations arising from the principles of the Constitution itself. It would undoubtedly be an abuse of power is so exercised as to impair the separate existence and independent self-government of the States, or if exercised for ends inconsistent with the limited grants of power in the Constitution.

There are paragraphs from the opinion of the court in those two cases, and in each case the court has held that Congress must be bound by the express grant of power in the Constitution in the appropriation of money. I simply present them as something along the line suggested by the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I am familiar with that general rule which the courts have announced from time to time, but the instances in which the Congress of the United States has appropriated money outside of what the Senator assumes to be the rule there laid down, are very numerous.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I know that to be true.

Mr. BORAH. The fact is that when we come to analyze the decisions upon the facts, there is practically no limit if the Congress is acting within what the Congress deems to be the public welfare.

Mr. TYDINGS. But as limited by the express power.

Mr. BORAH. What is the express power? What is the provision of the Constitution which would prevent our appropriating $500,000,000 with a view to trying to settle the agricultural problem, which is called a farm problem, but is not a farm problem? It is a national problem involving the welfare of every man, woman, and child in the United States, whether in the city or on the farm, a matter just as important for the preservation of prosperity and the economic welfare of the United States as any other proposition that comes before us. It is a great national problem, affecting the whole people, and there are both precedents and law for an appropriation to meet the problem.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true as an abstract proposition. I could conceive of how Congress could fix in such a way the equalization fee that the court could very well hold that it was an abuse of the express power outlined in the Constitution; that we were not to finance groups or individuals in this manner. It certainly is an innovation in American Government to have an equalization fee incorporated in a bill with the sanction of Congress.

Mr. BORAH. I am not arguing for the equalization fee. I want to eliminate it and make a direct appropriation for the benefit of the American farmer and so solve the problem. Under every test we could possibly have applied it is a national problem of national concern, and in my opinion there are numerous decisions which would sustain it. Not long since we went to the extent of appropriating $20,000,000 or $40,000,000, I have forgotten which, for the farmers of Russia.

Mr. TYDINGS. But that question was not carried to the Supreme Court of the United States. I think if it had been carried there it would have been held to be a grant without any authority in the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, I do not regard this matter as being important, because the bill is made up and those who are supporting it believe in its principles and are advocating it; but if it were simply a question of whether we had the power to appropriate the money for this purpose, I think I could satisfy the Senator, upon decisions of the Supreme Court, that we have the power.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not question that. I did not mean that we might not make a direct appropriation for the benefit of agriculture. I agree with the Senator thoroughly, but I do think we can make an appropriation through the equalization fee in such a manner that the constitutionality of our act would be very much questioned. I think we could appropriate this sum of money for the benefit of agriculture. We certainly have that authority under the Constitution, because it is expressly granted therein; but I can also conceive how we might fix it in the form of a tax, and the Supreme Court has said the taxing power of the Congress must be within the limits of the express authority of the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. I have my opinion about the constitutionality of the equalization fee, but I am not going to discuss the question of constitutionality now. I did that once before and with about the same effect that it would have now. I do not contend that the equalization fee is constitutional. I have not changed my view upon that point. But the minute that we make a general appropriation for this purpose we eliminate, in my judgment, every constitutional question which can be raised as to the bill save the one of making a general appropriation for this purpose, and in my opinion plenty of authorities can be shown to sustain that purpose.

Mr. TYDINGS. I agree with the Senator in that. I thank the Senator from Ohio for giving me an opportunity to insert in the RECORD the two paragraphs from the opinions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. FESS. I am very glad the Senator made the contribution.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. If I understood the Senator from Ohio, he would support a measure which would supply a revolving fund to which the farmers could have access, but eliminating the equalization fee.

Mr. FESS. My position is that the problem could be solved through marketing associations. I would be very willing to support any measure providing for an authorization of sufficient money to finance the cooperative associations, enabling them to take off the market, for the time being, the product that gluts the market, because it is thrown on it all at once.

Mr. HEFLIN. When this measure was before the Senate on another occasion, I gave one of the reasons the Senator now states as my reason for opposing the bill, that the members of an association had no right to tax those not in the association to raise money to pay for its control of all the producers.

Mr. FESS. I agree with the Senator.

I did not intend to speak at any length at all, other than just to make a statement of why I could not vote for the bill. I have been led into more or less desultary remarks that I did not intend to utter.

I would support any measure that provided for the handling of the surplus through marketing associations, assisted by the Government; but I do not want the Government to do it as a government; I want the associations to do it. I should be perfectly willing that the associations should be financed through loans from the Government just as farmers are financed through the farm-land banks. Such a plan would not put the Government into the actual buying and selling business.

But this bill goes further than that. Not only does it embrace the equalization fee, which is wholly objectionable to me. but it contains the insurance feature. If limited to the members of associations, I should not oppose at all that feature of the measure, but when it is extended to nonmembers that seems to me absolutely impossible, un-American, inequitable, and unjust from every standpoint.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. FESS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator from Ohio is willing to support a proposal to provide Government aid to handle the exportable surplus. That amounts to about $2,000,000,000 a year in the form in which it is exported. Is the Senator willing to vote for a sufficiently large appropriation to meet such a situation so that it will surely be financed?

Mr. FESS. Certainly I can not imagine that the amount would be anything like the figure which the Senator suggests; I do not think there is any possibility of that, because all it would be necessary to do would be to take the surplus off the market, if we knew what it was.

Mr. BROOKHART. The surplus, as I have stated, amounts to about $2,000,000,000 a year.

Mr. FESS. The Senator knows that in so doing cash down would not be required, nor would it be necessary to purchase all of the surplus.

Mr. BROOKHART. Take the surplus of cotton. If the surplus cotton should be purchased and dumped at once on the world market that would ruin the world market. If, having 60 or 65 per cent of the world's exportable cotton, we should hold it, we would control the world market, and would have no loss, but it would take much more capital to hold it.

Mr. FESS. There was one thing stated by the author of the bill, which was one of the strongest points he made for it, to the effect that the operation of the equalization fee would limit production—that it would regulate production. In other words, the equalization fee, in a sense, is a penalty, for it would not be operative unless there was a surplus; and the greater the surplus the more necessary the operation, and, therefore, if the penalty should be applied to the surplus it would have a tendency to reduce the surplus. I do not believe that argument is strong. I can see the basis of it, but I think the result will be a disappointment to my friends. I feel absolutely certain that if we go into any sort of guaranty, whether it be through an equalization fee or not, the one direct, inevitable result will be to increase the surplus instead of decreasing it; and if the surplus is the problem, then the one thing we ought to avoid is increasing it; we should decrease it.

The marketing associations would have the effect, I think, of limiting production; they would temper the amount of production upon the theory that if there should be a loss the farmer himself, who would operate the marketing associations, would suffer it, and he himself would be the cause of it. Therefore farmers speaking to the producers would have much more effect than for the Government to speak to the producers, as everyone must admit.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio, of course, agrees that there is a farm problem?

Mr. FESS. Yes; indeed there is.

Mr. GOODING. And that we can not help the farmer unless we shall increase his prices. I agree with the Senator so far as he goes in relation to marketing, but he does not go far enough.

Mr. FESS. There is where I differ from the Senator.

Mr. GOODING. Without an equalization fee or without something that will raise the price to the farmer and give him the American price for the American cost of production he can not be helped at all.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho takes the view that the marketing associations can not solve the problem. I differ from the Senator as to that. If the marketing associations shall be financed by the Government, and supplied with capital, they can handle the problem. The only reason why heretofore they have not been able to handle the problem is that the associations could not be financed; they could not get the capital. The minute that we shall make the associations furnish their own capital, then they have got to enter into a profit-making business, and farmers will not join when a profit is made out of it. However, on the other hand, if capital can be loaned to the associations, then there will not be any doubt about the associations taking care of the situation. The Senator wants to go beyond that. He says the associations will not do it; therefore that the Government must do it. There is where I differ from him. The Government must not do it. Otherwise we shall have the Government handling all products of the American farm; and I think that would be most dangerous. It would produce an acute situation.

Mr. GOODING. The farmer is not asking anything more in this proposed legislation than the Government has already given the manufacturer in the Webb-Pomerene Act—the right to sell cheaper abroad than he sells at home.

Mr. FESS. Oh, no.

Mr. GOODING. So far as the wheat grower especially is concerned, unless we shall give him the world's price plus the tariff on wheat, we can not help the wheat grower at all; and he is a big factor in agriculture.

Mr. FESS. There is no dispute but that there is a farm problem; we all agree to that; and all of us know how the farm problem came about. During the World War the price of everything went up. Since the war the organizations of industry have limited production within the demands of consumption. That has been due to management.

If we could apply that system to the farm we would solve this problem immediately. Whenever we produce, no matter what it is, beyond the needs of consumption, the price goes down. If we have an unlimited supply of potatoes, potatoes are a glut on the market; and the same thing applies to apples, and to all other commodities. The Senator who is gracing the Chair at the present moment [Mr. SHORTRIDGE in the chair] will recall, I believe, that the raisin industry furnished a very outstanding example of the number of carloads that could not be sold at all. If agriculture could follow the lead of the manufacturing industry and limit production to the demands of consumption, the price would be stabilized; but that can not be done. The Senator from Oregon has expressed the thought over and over again—and I think it has been conclusively demonstrated—that the production of the farmer can not be regulated as is done in the case of manufacturers.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President——

Mr. FESS. Just a moment. I admit that is a difficult problem. I think we can temper it. The Senator from Idaho and those who are supporting the bill are attempting to temper it by the equalization fee.

The other element of cost is labor. Labor is organized; labor maintains itself on a high cost level. In the case of industry, when the manufacture of an article is limited according to consumption, and the price of labor is maintained at a high level the price of the article is stabilized on a high level, and that makes the farmer pay a high price for the manufactured commodities he buys. That is easily seen. The question has come to us, Should we forbid regulation of production? We all say no; that would be an unsafe procedure. The question also arises, Should we reduce the price of labor in order to lower the price of manufactured commodities? There is a universal agreement that well-paid labor is the soundest economy, for it means a great purchasing power, and purchasing power is the measure of prosperity. Therefore, steady employment at a high wage level is sound economically, and therefore there is no desire to reduce the wages of labor. That means that the commodities the farmer buys, generally speaking, due to these two factors, are on a high price level and can not be brought down. We ought, therefore, to bring up the price of the commodities produced by the farmer if we can do so. The way I think it should be done is to control the marketing and also the production in the degree that we can; hold the commodity off of the market, avoid a break in the price, and feed it only as the market can take it. Then prices will be kept up. However, I should never do that by the process proposed by this bill; first, because it is not necessary, as I see it. Agriculture does need Government aid, but only in financing the marketing. I want the marketing left in the hands of the farmer himself. I do not want the Government to take it out of the hands of the farmer.

If the Government should take production out of the control of the farmer, then we would be forced into the position that a Government agency might say to the farmer how much he shall sow.

If we should undertake such a process in the case of one industry, we would have to do it with all others. I think it is a most serious question. I will join with anybody in endeavoring to reach a solution of the problem on the basis of marketing; but I can not vote for the pending measure. It is a remedy that I think is worse than the disease. There are some elements new in it, but they are vicious The insurance provision will certainly have to come out, for I can not see any equity in it at all; and certainly the protection prices for the packer and for the miller is wholly unjustified, and that certainly will have to come out. If the equalization fee were taken out of the bill and the insurance feature were amended to apply only to members of associations, I would vote for it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, when the Senator says that the provisions of the bill mentioned by him must come out, does he mean that they must come out or there will be a veto of the bill? Is that what the Senator means?

Mr. FESS. I do not have any right to speak for the Chief Executive.

Mr. SIMMONS. What does the Senator mean then when he says that the features of the bill mentioned by him must come out?

Mr. FESS. Because they will break down if the bill shall be put in operation. So far as I can give my opinion, Mr. President, as to whether or not this bill will be vetoed, I do not see how a man of the economic judgment of the President of the United States could sign it, and I would be the most surprised man in this Chamber if he should sign it, although I know nothing about his attitude, and have not talked with him on the subject at all.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Ohio is of that opinion, I am sure the President will veto it, because I know of no man on the floor of the Senate who has the confidence of the administration to a greater extent than has the Senator from Ohio.

Mr FESS. No; the Senator is not quite fair with me. I know the cordial good nature of the Senator, but he is not fair with me.

Mr. WHEELER. I think the Senator from Ohio is too modest.

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Montana is hardly fair. I am giving merely my own opinion, and it must stand for that and that only.

Mr. SIMMONS. When I asked the question of the Senator a few moments ago as to a matter of which he spoke with such certainty and emphasis I thought he must refer to a veto of the bill.

Mr. FESS. I had no such reference.

Mr. SIMMONS. I recognize the fact, of course, that he is more entitled to be considered the spokesman of the administration upon this bill, at any rate, than anybody else on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. FESS. My very good friend, for whom I have such high regard, would not do me an injustice, because I know his character.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am trying to pay the Senator the compliment of being the special and selected spokesman of the President. Does the Senator regard that as a reflection upon him?

Mr. FESS. Certainly the President has only the spokesman of the leader of this body, and that is our friend from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. MCKELLAR. But, Mr. President, if he did happen to veto the bill, it would spoil part of a mighty good keynote speech; would it not?

Mr. FESS. Oh, no; nobody is making up a keynote speech.

Mr. WHEELER. There will be nothing in the keynote speech with reference to farm legislation.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHORTRIDGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator now disclaims having any authority to speak for the President, then he is not trying to impress the Senate with the danger of having the bill vetoed, is he?

Mr. FESS. No.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is just an expression of opinion?

Mr. FESS. Purely so.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator think that is any better guess than it was when the Senator was running the President for reelection?

Mr. FESS. That matter has been thrashed out here so often that I do not want to take it up again.

Mr. CARAWAY. I remember the Senator's statement about it.

Mr. FESS. I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that the attitude of the Executive on a matter of legislation has absolutely no effect upon a vote here. It has no more effect with the Senator from Ohio than with the Senator from Arkansas. I agree with the Senator from Arkansas that every bit of legislation thrashed out on this floor should be thrashed out with reference to the legislative department of the Government, with very little regard to what the Executive will do. That is my view of it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then why should the Senator inject into this discussion his belief that the President would veto the bill if it were passed?

Mr. FESS. Not because I thought it would deter any vote, but because I was answering the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. I wanted to be perfectly respectful to my good friend.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, of course; but was the Senator trying to brace up the President?

Mr. FESS. Not in the least. He does not need any bracing.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought he did for making him run again. I thought the Senator had spent all last summer trying to do that.

Mr. FESS. If he had decided to run——

Mr. CARAWAY. He would not ask the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FESS. He would not ask the Senator from Ohio or any other Senator, and he would run so fast that the rest of us could not keep in front of him.

Mr. CARAWAY. If he would not pay any attention to the Senator, why did he go around so persistently nominating him?

Mr. WHEELER. He will nominate him before he gets through.

Mr. FESS. Has not the Senator from Ohio a right to have his own play if he desires to?

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, if he is just playing, I have no objection.

Mr. FESS. That is what he is doing.

Mr. WHEELER. He has only been talking about nominating him heretofore, but he will actually do the job in Kansas City.

Mr. CARAWAY. He will do it by himself, then.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I shall have to exercise my authority as a Senator not to allow my good friends here to put too much in my speech that I do not want in it. I yield the floor.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, there are two or three propositions advanced by the distinguished Senator from Ohio

[Mr. FESS] in the conclusion of his argument that I should like to mention.

First, he says he would be in favor of loans to aid these cooperatives to settle this great surplus problem.

I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that we authorized loans for that specific purpose in the War Finance Corporation. The managers told me that they were practically without limit; that there was no reason why they could not have loaned them a billion dollars, or perhaps $2,000,000,000, if necessary; and yet it did not solve the farm problem. It was made worse.

Then we turned around, and we established in the law another system of loans, the intermediate credit banks; and that law specifically authorized lending up to $600,000,000. That law is in force right now, and yet we all concede that we have this farm problem on hand. So, after experiences like that, I can not see any solution in merely going around and doing over again the same thing that has twice failed, and on such a great scale.

The Senator's next proposition is that we would get an overproduction of farm products, and our surplus would increase, and instead of settling the surplus problem we would make it worse. I hope the Senator will read the report of the National Industrial Conference Board on that proposition.

Mr. FESS. I have read it.

Mr. BROOKHART. That report shows distinctly that there is a progressive decline in the surplus, and that even if stimulated by a stabilization of prices and an increase of prices it will still gradually fade out, until perhaps 30 or 40 years from now we will have no surplus at all.

Mr. FESS. The Senator will agree that that report opposed this bill, will he not?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; I will agree that it was made by the enemies of the farmers. I will agree to that.

Mr. FESS. Would the Senator, in his opposition to a loan, cut out of the bill the loan provided for?

Mr. BROOKHART. No; there is one reason why I would have a loan in the bill, and why I have it in my substitute, and that is the same reason why it is put in the Federal land bank law. In my amendment I have required these cooperatives to subscribe for cooperative stock in this institution, exactly as the farmers were required to do the same thing as they took out loans in the Federal land banks.

Mr. FESS. I stated that I had not read the Senator's amendment.

Mr. BROOKHART. Ultimately, I hoped we would get enough of those organizations and cooperative stock subscriptions to repay the Government, and take the Government out of this business. I have only contemplated doing this temporarily, until we could organize these cooperatives strongly enough and efficiently enough to handle the proposition and take it over.

Mr. FESS. I should like to ask the Senator a question there.

Mr. BROOKHART. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. FESS. Suppose the bill becomes a law, and is put into operation? Does the Senator think it will be temporary?

Mr. BROOKHART. Which bill?

Mr. FESS. The present bill.

Mr. BROOKHART. No. The present bill makes no provision for changing into a cooperative; but the substitute which I have offered does make such a provision, and I did not discuss that feature of it in my speech the other day.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator speaks about overproduction. I should like to ask the Senator if, in his judgment, the equalization fee can be so administered and utilized as to restrain overproduction?

Mr. BROOKHART. I think not. I think there is no difference between that and a direct appropriation.

Mr. BORAH. The reason why I ask that question is that I have understood that one of the serious objections to a direct appropriation as compared with an equalization fee was the belief that the administration of the equalization fee can be made effective to restrain overproduction, and I wanted to ask the Senator's opinion on that matter. I do not think so myself.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is provided in the bill by stopping operations on some article where they are producing too much. The board has to make a finding that they are overproducing, and I do not think this board would ever make any such finding.

Nobody can tell whether there would be overproduction in a year or not; and I think myself there is no regulation of this production by equalization fee. I think the growth of population is gradually regulating the surplus proposition, and I think in 25 or 30 or 40 years from now there will be no surplus problem in the United States; there will be no surplus; but, as I said the other day, I do not want to stay in bankruptcy 30 or 40 years.

Mr. FESS. The Senator means by that that the demand is going to increase more rapidly than the production?

Mr. BROOKHART. It is increasing more rapidly and has been for many years.

Mr. FESS. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. BROOKHART. The per capita production is steadily decreasing on practically everything all the time. It is a slow rate, but it is decreasing.

Mr. FESS. I believe that within a limited time we will be importing foodstuffs.

Mr. BROOKHART. We are importing an immense amount of certain foodstuffs now, a vast amount, almost as much as we are exporting; I do not remember exactly.

Mr. BORAH. We are now importing farm products to the amount of more than two billions and a half a year.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is more than we are exporting.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; it is.

Mr. BROOKHART. If the Senator is correct—and I have no doubt he is correct—part of that consists of things we can not produce, though a considerable portion of it we can produce.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McLEAN. I think we have had one short crop of wheat in the last 125 years. There has been a surplus every year for more than a century.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; but it was only eighty or ninety million bushels—a comparatively small amount.

Mr. McLEAN. Does the Senator think it would tend to decrease the surplus if we should enact a law that would enable all the wheat growers to produce wheat at a profit?

Mr. BROOKHART. As I said the other day, if we should enact such a law as to wheat alone, out in Iowa we would quit corn right away and go to wheat; and we can produce more wheat than anybody else. We have the best soil and the best chance to do it; but if you protect corn and livestock products, we would rather produce those than wheat. They are still more suitable to our soil and to our climate, and we will not go to wheat if you protect them all alike. That is what I have proposed to do in my amendment, and that is what the Senator from Oregon proposes to do in his bill.

Mr. McLEAN. But if you protect corn so that a profit will be insured, and protect wheat so that the growers of wheat are sure of a profit, and so on down the list, why will they not increase the acreage just as they did in war time? They increased the acreage on wheat 30,000,000 acres in war time.

Mr. FESS. Forty-five, was it not?

Mr. McLEAN. Thirty million.

Mr. FESS. Forty-five million all together.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have forgotten the figures; but they increased that acreage by reducing the pasturage, and reducing, therefore, the production of livestock——

Mr. McLEAN. Certainly.

Mr. BROOKHART. And switching from one to the other; but we propose in my amendment to this bill, to take care of all of these products alike that have an exportable surplus, so that there will be no occasion any longer to switch from one to the other.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator knows that we could produce cotton and wheat and corn and all the other foodstuffs in this country in sufficient quantity to support twice the present population, and more, too, if there were any money in it.

Mr. BROOKHART. If there were enough farmers to do it, and if we had enough land, that could be done; but there is the National Industrial Conference Board's report, making an analysis of every product, and every item shows that the per capita production is declining every year. The population is growing considerably faster than agricultural production of the United States, and even the increased efficiency is offset, and everything else that goes to measure up the production of agricultural products is declining in proportion to the population of the United States.

Mr. McLEAN. That is very true; and so we perceive at once the difficulty of controlling the price of a product unless we can control the quantity produced and also the amount consumed. We must control both if we are to produce the desired result.

Mr. BROOKHART. Manufacturing is not doing that. It is controlling the surplus that it is exporting.

Mr. McLEAN. That may be true; but I think the Senator stated the other day that something like 40 per cent of the corporations in this country—and I take it most of them are manufacturing corporations—lost money last year.

Mr. BROOKHART. I said the condition was worse than that. I said that they lost money for the last five years, because the agricultural depression has at last reached up to the corporations, and they are now failing because there is no buying power in agriculture to keep them going.

Mr. McLEAN. They are failing because they can not sell their product, but they do not come to the Government to get aid. I do not say that because I would not like to see this problem solved.

Mr. BROOKHART. They do not come to the Government to get aid? Why, they are the first fellows to squeal for aid. They howl for a protective tariff louder than anybody howls; and they have always gotten it.

Mr. McLEAN. But the Government has never given them a tariff to raise the price of their surplus. If they have a surplus, they have to take care of it themselves. What you want to do is to put a bounty on surplus.

Mr. BROOKHART. I would have no objection to that. I can see how that might relieve the situation, and if the Democratic side gets up the nerve, as they have threatened to do, to offer a debenture bill, as the National Grange has asked, I will vote for it, because that would provide the bounty the Senator speaks of, and it would give us some relief. But I do not want to leave this question of protecting these manufacturers without another word, because the Senator from Indiana himself [Mr. WATSON] puts a statement in the RECORD from Judge Gary, of the United States Steel Corporation, saying that they sell their surplus abroad at a loss, or for whatever they can get for it.

Mr. McLEAN. That is precisely what I say.

Mr. BROOKHART. But they charge the domestic market; under tariff protection, enough to make up for that loss, and to take enormous, even extortionate, profits from the people of the United States besides.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not know about that. The farmer has the same privilege that the manufacturer has in disposing of his surplus.

Mr. BROOKHART. The farmer has no method of financing his surplus. His finances are controlled by a banking system in the hands of the people on the other side of the counter from the farmer, and he does not have control even of his own deposits, under that system. There are no finances he can reach. This intermediate credit bank does not work.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator has just stated that the facilities for the extension of credit are ample. I have understood the Senator to say several times on the floor of this Chamber that one of the main difficulties with the agricultural situation was that Congress had been too kind to the farmer, that he had borrowed too much money, and it was time to stop that, because the only result was that he was getting further and further into debt, and he could not get out.

Mr. BROOKHART. I do not think the Senator has ever heard me say those words.

Mr. McLEAN. That in substance.

Mr. BROOKHART. It is not more loans I want; it is better prices for the farm products; and the farmer is entitled to that, so he can pay his loans. I say that the farmer is the greatest producing manufacturer in this country, produces the things that sustain life itself, and he is entitled to a profit on his capital investment, and he has not had it since 1920.

Mr. McLEAN. The farmers in Iowa are pretty prosperous now, are they not?

Mr. BROOKHART. They are not, and they have not been since 1920.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator's statement does not agree with statements I have had called to my attention.

Mr. BROOKHART. I would like to hear the statements to which the Senator refers, and I will tell him something about them.

Mr. McLEAN. I will ask the clerk to read what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

[Baltimore Sun of July 31, 1927]

WHAT'S THE MATTER WITH IOWA?

So much lamentation comes out of Iowa that anything which partakes of good cheer is read with surprise. Its politicians are so busily engaged in schemes to make the farmer prosperous by new laws that they seem to overlook what is happening behind their backs. While they cry ruin, the Iowa Daily Press Association is spending money to prove that the State is getting along swimmingly.

Iowa's income from agricultural products in 1926, as advertised by this organization, was $719,145,000, approximately $60,000,000 more than the year before and $230,000,000 higher than in 1921. Hogs, the greatest single factor in this showing, represented $305,750,000. Since 1921 income from livestock and livestock products has risen 60 per cent. Last year, we are told, but 15 per cent of agricultural income came from the sale of grain, the price of which constituted Iowa's chief complaint, while nearly 86 per cent came from livestock and its products.

The Equitable Life Insurance Co., which has loaned more than $50,000,000 in the State, reports that "the majority of farmers are making a profit." The secretary of the Federal land bank at Council Bluffs, which has out on farm mortgage more than $68,000,000, says that delinquencies on installments 60 days overdue amount to but $15,900. The Daily Iowa Press Association declares that this reflects the experience of virtually all companies with extensive loans in Iowa.

If statistics and reports of this character are difficult to reconcile with the lugubrious accounts coming from political spokesmen for the Corn Belt, we recall that an optimistic fellow broke up a particularly gloomy meeting there by citing similar data and asserting that if Iowa farmers were going to the poorhouse they were going in their own limousines.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, the statement which the Senator has just had read is even believed by the Senator himself, from the way he laughs. That idea is spread all over the eastern part of the country, and the people there take it for granted that those figures show a condition of prosperity in the State of Iowa.

Iowa is the best agricultural spot on this big, round earth. You can not lay its map down on any other spot on this earth that produces as much out of the soil as does the State of Iowa. Yet since 1920 she has received a price for those products so low that she could not pay her taxes and expenses of operation. Her land values have declined nearly $3,000,000.

Mr. McLEAN. How much did they go up during the war?

Mr. BROOKHART. The price index of Iowa land at the peak reached 213. The price index of all products in the United States at the same moment was 241. Other products have gone down but little, and Iowa land has gone back from 1920 to 1925 from $227 an acre to $149 an acre, and that decline has continued right up to this moment.

Mr. McLEAN. The price of land in Iowa is much higher to-day than it was before the war.

Mr. BROOKHART. It is not. It is at this moment much lower than it was before the war.

Mr. CARAWAY. And every other product is higher.

Mr. BROOKHART. And every other product that Iowa is buying is higher. There was a statement published about Iowa lands to prove that we had prosperity. It said that 52 per cent of the farms in Iowa have no mortgages on them. Of course, they have not. Many of them have been foreclosed and the mortgages canceled by the foreclosures, but that fact was not stated. There ought to be no foreclosures in Iowa. I practiced law 30 years in Iowa and did not know what a foreclosure of a mortgage was, and handling such business now is almost the principal business of the lawyers.

Mr. President, I want to tell the Senator something about this Iowa Daily Press Association. I had more than 90 per cent of that association fighting me out in Iowa in my campaign. I had all the chambers of commerce against me, because they hooked up with the United States Chamber of Commerce, which delights in publishing this sort of stuff about the situation. I had the Bankers' Association against me. I do not mean all the bankers, because some of them have figured out some of these things. I do not mean that all the members of the chambers of commerce were against me, but even the chamber to which I belong was against me, in its organization.

I had all that situation, and then I was running against the most distinguished citizen of the State, and I was able to carry only 85 out of 99 counties. I carried only 10 out of 11 districts. The people out there know what is going on in Iowa, and now is as good a time as any to let the people in the East know that they no longer are going to be able to put this thing over on us in this way. Something is going to happen if they persist in the discrimination that exists against agriculture.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator if he thinks Secretary Hoover will get any more votes in Iowa than the Senator did?

Mr. BROOKHART. Secretary Hoover will not get any more than CHARLES G. DAWES will.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I will let the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from South Dakota settle that question between themselves. I simply want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the article which I had read contained information based upon reports prepared by citizens of Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. Who are those citizens of Iowa? Those are the ones profiteering off of the farmers of the State. Those are the men selling advertising. They go to the manufacturers of the East and say, "Advertise in our papers. See what a great amount of stuff is being produced out in Iowa. Come and get it and take it away from our farmers, so that more of the mortgages will be foreclosed." That is the crowd that publishes that kind of stuff against Iowa. I am not afraid of that crowd. I like to have them against me.

Mr. McLEAN. This statement contains a statement of the amount of money received for certain crops in Iowa. Are those figures incorrect? Are the statements contained there incorrect?

Mr. BROOKHART. I am not able to state. At one time they published a statement as to the amount of corn and then the number of hogs and the number of cattle, and added them together, but never figured out how much of the corn was fed to the hogs and cattle.

Mr. McLEAN. Then the Senator does not know whether the figures are correct or not.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is the kind of publicity that crowd has put out.

Mr. McLEAN. But if the statements are correct, there is no harm in publishing them.

Mr. BROOKHART. No; but it does not give the other side of the account; it does not give the cost of production or the other side.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator if it is not common for them, in submitting statistics, to ignore the fact that the purchasing power of money has been greatly reduced?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. NORBECK. And, therefore, a comparison of prices received now with those received 10 years ago is very misleading.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is very true.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I would like to ask again how we are going to change this inequality between the manufacturer and the farmer if we are going to give the manufacturer his protection free and make the farmer pay for his?

Mr. BROOKHART. On that proposition I am in accord with the Senator's suggestion. I think the Government of the United States owes it to the farmers to bring about this equality out of the Treasury of the United States. When we turned the railroads back, we did not hesitate to put a provision in the law guaranteeing the operating expenses and the war-time profits for six months; and the operators of those railroads went out then and increased the operating expenses fourteen hundred and eighty-five million dollars the first year after the roads were turned back, and we went into the Treasury and wrote our check and paid $529,000,000 to make that guaranty good; and the Senator from Connecticut never squawked once about that being socialism, or anything of the kind. That was perfectly good business when that happened, and he supported that bill and supported that subsidy to the railroads of the United States.

Mr. McLEAN. Of course, the Senator knows that that subject has been debated in this body a great many times; and certainly there is no analogy between the situation presented by the railroads and the situation now presented by agriculture.

Mr. BROOKHART. No; there was not an analogy, because the Government took over wheat, for instance, and made a profit of $59,000,000, and tucked that away in the Treasury. That is why there is no analogy.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator knows that there is no foundation for the claim that there is an analogy between the tariff which benefits the manufacturer and the tariff which benefits the farmer, in that the farmer does not get the benefit of the tariff and the manufacturer does; because, Mr. President, when a manufacturer gets a surplus, he has to take care of it himself. A tariff is imposed for the purpose of stimulating competition in this country in the production of the necessities of life.

Mr. BROOKHART. The tariff does take care of his domestic market, though.

Mr. McLEAN. Just a minute. When the manufacturer gets a surplus he has to look out for it himself. He does not come to Congress and ask Congress to take money from the Treasury for the purpose of pegging the price of his surplus. When you propose to assess—I do not care how you phrase it—when you propose to get money out of the Treasury for the purpose of boosting the price of the surplus that scheme will be fatal, because it encourages, it can not help but encourage, and increases production, and that is just what you do not want.

Mr. WHEELER. That is one of the things which is troubling the woolen mills in Massachusetts.

Mr. McLEAN. The trouble with the woolen mills is that the tariff is not high enough.

Mr. WHEELER. They wrote it themselves.

Mr. McLEAN. But it was not high enough. Senators on the other side of the Chamber would not let them have sufficient protection. I want to say now that the highest rates in the tariff act of 1922 are the lowest in so far as the element of protection is concerned. That is the trouble in the country to-day. The tariff is not high enough on many industries to give adequate protection—that is, enough to equal the difference between the cost of production here and abroad.

Mr. BORAH. A short time ago the President was called on, under the so-called flexible tariff law, to increase the tariff upon certain products. The President increased the tariff. The Treasury of the United States lost several million dollars by that increase. The parties for whom the increase was made received an increase in the price of their product. What the President's order did was to deprive the Treasury of a large sum of money for the benefit of a particular product. What is the difference in principle between that and making an appropriation direct for the purpose of increasing the prices of a product?

Mr. McLEAN. In the first place the producers of an article that called for an increase found themselves against foreign competition which would have driven them out of business, if it had not already driven them out of business, if they did not get the increase. We will assume that this increase enables them to produce that article in this country and sell it in this country to such an extent that they find themselves with a surplus on their hands. They have to take care of that surplus themselves. The Government does not aid them there.

Mr. BORAH. I am now speaking of the fact that the Government of the United States yielded its right to an income of several million dollars a year for the purpose of aiding an industry. In other words, if the President had not made the raise in the tariff, the Treasury of the United States would have been some several million dollars better off. What he did was to deprive the Treasury of so much money for the benefit of a particular product.

Mr. McLEAN. It may be that a part of the benefit which would result to the American people was by reason of the maintenance of an industry here which, in the long run, might produce a surplus, and the effect of the surplus might reduce the price of the product down below where it was when the tariff was raised. That has happened many times. I think the price of steel rails to-day is just about what the tariff was when it was first imposed. The effect has been the same with regard to a great many other products, tin, and other essentials.

I know now that the dairymen in the country are trying to get a slight increase on milk and cream because of the competition coming in from Canada. It seems to me that that is an advisable thing to do. It is better than to so cripple an industry in this country that sometime we will be dependent upon the Canadian producers for milk and cream. But if the dairymen in this country produce a surplus, they have to take care of it themselves. They would like to come in under this bill, but it is impracticable. They can not do it.

The Senator must see that if we boost the price of the feedstuffs which the dairymen use, we are crippling the dairy industry in the country. That is the trouble with the bill or one of the main troubles with it. There is no agricultural class, in the sense that we have a common interest. On the contrary, there are as many classes of agriculturists as there are colors of the rainbow, and a good many more, and the minute we increase the prices of one agricultural industry we cripple perhaps another industry.

Mr. BORAH. That is precisely what the protective tariff does. If we raise the price of cotton goods and such things, we are increasing the price which somebody has to pay for them.

Mr. McLEAN. If we increase the price of cotton in this country; of course, cotton is not a good illustration, because we do not import cotton.

Mr. BORAH. We import cotton goods.

Mr. McLEAN. Yes. I want to impress the Senator that the producer of cotton goods, if he finds himself with a surplus on hand, must look out for himself. He can not come to Congress and get an appropriation to take care of the surplus and continue to increase that surplus, and still produce the article at a profit.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a brief statement?

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I must decline to yield further until I can answer the Senator from Connecticut.

The Senator from Connecticut asked a question that I want to answer before I forget it. He said the tariff, while it protected the home market, did not provide funds to take care of the surplus; that if a manufacturer had a surplus he had to look out for financing and taking care of it himself. I want to answer the Senator's question. I want to say that by law, sponsored and supported by the Senator from Connecticut, the Government of the United States went into the banking business for the manufacturers of the United States and not only established national banks but established a Federal reserve bank, an overhead bank, for those national banks.

The Government by law created the Federal Reserve Board as a Government board and its officers are appointed by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate of the United States. The operation of that board, as predicted by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] when he presented the bill to the House, was that it would reduce the speculative loans and turn the surplus credit of the country over to more legitimate business. Now, we have seen those speculative loans, which were then $766,000,000 and described by him as a cancer, grow into $4,000,000,000. So that the commercial business of the country, the manufacturing business, the speculating business, have asked the Government, by a law, to furnish them money. They have taken the surplus credits of Iowa itself away from Iowa, and have them down in New York now in the speculative business, and backing the exports of the surplus of the manufacturers, and they get a low rate of interest and the farmers have got to pay a high rate of interest if they use their own deposits.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator does not admit that anybody in Iowa has any money to loan, does he?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; we have some manufacturers out there.

Mr. McLEAN. Then somebody is prosperous in Iowa?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; something is prosperous. It is not the farmers. While their land went down $3,000,000,000, railroad stocks went up more than $3,000,000,000 in the United States. That is what happened all along the line.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator knows there are some 30,000 banks in the country.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; and I know that about 400 of them out in Iowa have failed.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator has just stated that some of them have made money and were loaning it outside the State of Iowa,

Mr. BROOKHART. I do not think any bank in Iowa is making money now. They are sending their money down to New York and getting 1¾ to 4¼ per cent for it. About half of it is going that way.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator just remarked that money was going from Iowa to Wall Street to be used for speculative purposes.

Mr. BROOKHART. That booms stocks, and that means a higher cost of living to those who pay the profits on the stocks.

Mr. McLEAN. Let us see if we can follow out this idea. If that is true, I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that we have some 30,000 banks in the country, some in Iowa, and some of them make money. I think it very likely, too, that other activities in Iowa make money. Just how are we going to prevent the banks in Iowa from loaning their money wherever they please?

Mr. BROOKHART. I have introduced a bill providing an amendment to the banking act which will prevent them from loaning it for speculation in New York or anywhere else. I do not believe the Government of the United States has any right to establish by law a credit system for gambling.

Mr. McLEAN. Does the Senator think Congress would have the power to prohibit a State bank from loaning its money anywhere it pleased?

Mr. BROOKHART. It would have the power to deny it the use of the United States mails if it did that sort of thing, and I have that sort of a provision in my bill. Come again! [Laughter.]

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator certainly has quite a bill. I have not read it all yet.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes. I have been trying to figure this out from the standpoint of the farmers, to give them a square deal in credits, a square deal in marketing, a square deal in railroad rates, a square deal in the prices of the things they have to buy, and that is why I have seen those different phases of the situation. The trouble with the Senator from Connecticut is that he never sees it except from his particular little standpoint.

Mr. McLEAN. Connecticut went through experiences much more serious than Iowa has ever suffered, and that was in the days when agriculture was a very important industry in Connecticut. I will say to the Senator that when Iowa began to produce meat and grain, Connecticut had to stop; we could not compete.

Mr. SIMMONS. So Connecticut went into the manufacturing and insurance business?

Mr. McLEAN. We produce everything that is salable now. We did not come to Congress for help.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; but they came for a tariff, and that was all they needed.

Mr. BROOKHART. When Connecticut needed help she came to Congress for a tariff and got it. Congress helped Connecticut out and that raised the prices of her products, and Iowa paid the increased prices.

Mr. McLEAN. Oh, Mr. President, we can not all talk at once.

Mr. SIMMONS. I submit that the Senator from Connecticut has had very large latitude in his interruptions. I have been trying for some little time to just get in one word, but the Senator from Connecticut will not let me have the opportunity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa has the floor. To whom does he yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield now to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; let the Senator from North Carolina get in his word now; but first I want to say to the Senator from North Carolina——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think, if the Senator will pardon me, that we will find this line of cleavage, upon the question of whether prosperity exists, about the same throughout the entire country.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think the Senator is correct. The agricultural situation is the same in nearly all States.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what I was going to say.

Mr. BROOKHART. It is a general discrimination against agriculture.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is in every State in the Union. The agricultural conditions, unless there are some special lines of agriculture which are highly protected and whose protection is absolutely effective, are languishing. The prices of their products have gone down and the prices of their land, measured in the value of the dollar to-day as compared with the dollar before the war, are very much lower than they were before the war.

Mr. BROOKHART. Very much; scarcely half the value.

Mr. SIMMONS. We find the manufacturers and the railroads and the great corporations that have the benefit of the tariff and the trust combinations crying "prosperity," and they are prosperous.

Mr. BROOKHART. They are squeezing out a lot of the little fellows.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is generally impossible to get them to take a fair, equitable view of the condition of agriculture.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have only the permission of the Senator from Iowa to interrupt him.

Mr. BROOKHART. I will yield to the Senator from Connecticut for a question only.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator knows very well that the textile industry in New England, especially in the cotton-goods line, is suffering a period of depression. He knows that in large measure it is due to competition from North Carolina. The Senator has some of the largest cotton mills in the world in North Carolina to-day.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McLEAN. They pay in North Carolina less wages than we do, but we do not come to Congress and ask Congress to interfere with them. We have to take care of our surplus as best we can.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to say just a word in answer to a statement made by the Senator from Connecticut. One of the great reasons why there is a depression in the cotton industry in that State and in North Carolina as well is because the farmers, who comprise the great bulk of the population of the country, are in such a condition that they can not buy the goods.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator is absolutely right.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was going to say that, of course, I recognize the fact that we have conditions in the South much more favorable to textile manufacture than exist in New England. We have the raw material right at our door; instead of union labor we have nonunion labor; instead of strikes and lockouts we have harmony between our laborers and our manufacturers; and the manufacturers of New England are pretty rapidly moving toward the South for reasons that are perfectly apparent.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no control over the debate at all. I am simply interrupting the Senator from Iowa for the purpose of trying to make a statement.

Mr. BORAH. For North Carolina?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; not for North Carolina. I always speak for North Carolina when I have an opportunity or when occasion requires it, but occasion does not require it. North Carolina has attained to an eminence which does not require any boosting upon this floor any longer or any boosting in the country at large. North Carolina is taking care of herself.

Mr. McLEAN. How about the farmers of North Carolina?

Mr. SIMMONS. The farmers of North Carolina are not prosperous. The farmers of North Carolina are, like the farmers all over the United States, unprosperous. I happen to be one of them myself; and I want to say that I am probably just as good as the average farmer and I have a representative, anyway, about as good as the average, who manages my farm, and I have had no actual net income from that source since 1921.

Mr. McLEAN. I understood the Senator from North Carolina to say that North Carolina needed no boosting.

Mr. SIMMONS. I say that as compared with New England and the remainder of the States of the country, North Carolina and the South as a whole need no boosting.

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; but the farmers need boosting.

Mr. SIMMONS. The farmer does not need boosting, but he needs help; he needs to be put upon something like a parity in the price of his products with the price of commodities which he has to buy. In a section of country which is largely a one-crop section, our product being chiefly cotton, we have to buy very largely the things that we do not raise from elsewhere. We have to buy from manufacturers largely, and we have to buy their manufactures protected by a high tariff duty. Consequently, we have to pay a very high price, while we get only the low price of a nonprotected product.

However, what I meant to say was that the cleavage as to prosperity is between the farmer and the man who is engaged in railroad work or in manufacturing industry. Wherever agriculture is segregated, there is no doubt about the consensus of opinion being that agriculture is in a condition that requires some legislative consideration. I do not mean to say it needs a tariff, but it does need legislative consideration.

The Senator has talked about the manufacturer being able to take care of his surplus. Undoubtedly a protected manufacturer is able to take care of his surplus. He can sell it abroad for one-third or one-half of what he gets in this country, but that does not affect the price that he obtains for the remainder of his product in the American market 1 cent. On the contrary, if the cotton producers of this country produce 6,000,000 or 7,000,000 bales of cotton more than the world demands and throw it upon the markets of the world, the price is broken, not only abroad, but it is broken here at home.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina knows that nearly all of the foreign nations of consequence have enacted antidumping laws, and therefore the manufacturer of this country can not any longer dispose abroad of his surplus for one-third of its domestic price.

Mr. BROOKHART. There are only 16 countries that have enacted such laws, and that does not affect the situation. I showed that very fully the other day.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, there are some countries which have, as we have, antidumping laws, but still there are a great many other countries that are open and that have not any such antidumping laws, and the manufacturers are selling in those markets. But if they were excluded from those markets they have the power to control and to regulate the amount of their surplus.

Mr. BROOKHART. Absolutely.

Mr. SIMMONS. And if by some miscalculation they produce more than the markets of America demand, and if they have no foreign market in which they can dump the excess, they have the ability to hold that small quantity, because they can keep it reduced to a small quantity. But the farmers have no control over the quantity which they produce at all; their product is determined by the season; it is determined by pests; it is determined by floods; it is determined by a great many different conditions over which the farmers have absolutely no control.

Mr. McLEAN. That is very true, and because it is true Congress can not remedy the situation. The surplus of the farmer depends so intimately upon the weather that it is impossible for any board to regulate the production of crops so that there will be an even total from year to year.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let us take wheat, for instance. Congress has put a pretty high tariff on wheat, I believe, and a higher is, perhaps, desired on it; I do not know.

Mr. BROOKHART. There is now a tariff of 42 cents on wheat. That does not raise its price to the cost of production right now; that is not enough. There is only a tariff of 15 cents on corn.

Mr. SIMMONS. It would not make any difference how much the tariff was on wheat. If there is a surplus of wheat in the world's market, the tariff would not protect wheat in the slightest degree, would it?

Mr. BROOKHART. Not at all. I have the figures here on my desk showing No. 1 northern wheat running from 15 to 20 cents a bushel higher all last season at Winnipeg, Canada, than it was at Minneapolis, Minn.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, let us take the case of the wheat farmers. Suppose all the wheat farmers of this country were to come together and say, "We have a surplus this year of a million bushels of wheat."

Mr. BROOKHART. They have a surplus of more than a hundred million bushels.

Mr. SIMMONS. I started to say a hundred million bushels of wheat. "We will not dump that on the markets of the world; we will withhold it from the markets of the world." If there is without that a world oversupply from other sources, from other countries where wheat is grown, will that be any protection to the price of wheat to the farmer here, notwithstanding he has withdrawn his little surplus here in the United States?

Mr. BROOKHART. It would increase his local price up to the tariff level.

Mr. SIMMONS. It would increase it up to the tariff level, yes; and no further.

Mr. WATSON. But no higher.

Mr. SIMMONS. No higher.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, as the Senator knows——

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, with a tariff on the wheat, if the farmers were permitted to sell their surplus in the markets of the world and the markets of the world were not glutted, there would be produced a different condition altogether.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator knows what the result of Great Britain's attempt to valorize rubber has been.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I think I will have to take the floor again. There is one other proposition I wish to suggest to the Senator from Connecticut, and then I will yield the floor.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator knows what the result of the attempt to valorize coffee has been in Brazil. It might be possible to take care of the surplus of a year or two, but——

Mr. BROOKHART. I will have to decline to yield for further discussion.

Mr. McLEAN. But very soon the same result would follow your attempt to take care of the surplus of wheat. It can not be done that way.

Mr. SIMMONS. The point I want to make is that it does not make much difference how high the tariff is on wheat, if there is an overproduction in the world the price of wheat in this country is coming down to the world's price.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is the fact.

Now, Mr. President, I want to make a comparison between agriculture and manufacturing and then I am going to close. In agriculture there are about $60,000,000,000 invested, since the amount was squeezed down during the deflation, and there are about 12,000,000 workers engaged in farm work, not including the women and children who work the year around. There are about $40,000,000,000 of capital invested in manufacturing, only about two-thirds as much as in agriculture, and there are employed about 9,000,000 workers—the number was 8,778,000 the last time I checked the figures. With an investment in agriculture of $60,000,000,000 and 12,000,000 workers, there has been produced a gross value since 1920 of less than $12,000,000,000 per year on an average. On the other hand, the $40,000,000,000 of capital invested in manufacturing and the 9,000,000 workers have produced a gross value of nearly $60,000,000,000 a year.

That is not a fair comparison, and I want to make it fair. There is a bigger raw material bill for the manufacturer than there is for the farmer; but 27 per cent of the $12,000,000,000 in the case of agriculture is raw material. It represents seed, and work animals, and breeding animals, and things that must stay on the farm in order to operate the farm and which never get into the income account.

There is still a bigger percentage in the case of manufacturing, but to reduce the two percentages to about the same point, and taking $16,000,000,000 from the $60,000,000,000, we still have a gross production of $44,000,000,000 in the case of manufacturing, with two-thirds the amount of capital and three-fourths the number of workers as compared to agriculture.

It is said that the cause of the high price of manufactured products is the high wages of labor. I went to the Labor Department and added up the wages of those laborers, and I found out how much labor receives. It is only $11,000,000,000 out of the $44,000,000,000. The other $33,000,000,000 goes somewhere else—either into raw material or capital account or for operation and profits. I wish to ask, Mr. President, what chance have the farmers of the United States to achieve prosperity when they have to exchange $12,000,000,000, representing their gross production, into $44,000,000,000, produced by three-fourths of the workers and two-thirds of the capital of agriculture?

This discrimination is permanent, and is caused by law. I say that the interstate commerce law is the cause of, perhaps, 25 per cent of it in ordinary times. I have only put it at 10 per cent in the present situation, because of the drastic deflation of the farmers under the Federal reserve banking system. The law gives to the railroads a valuation by law and then a return by law, by the command of law itself. It may be said it is not a guaranty, but it is higher than a guaranty; it is the command of the law itself to the commission. Then there is the banking system, the credit system, giving a monopoly of the deposits of the people of the country to the State and National banking systems, and then establishing a Government overhead banking system in which the local banks are federated and united together.

They earned 8.34 per cent the last time I checked the figures, while the National Industrial Conference Board only claims a return on farm property of 1.7 per cent, and in that 1.7 per cent they allowed no adequate compensation—less than $700 a year—for the farmer's work, and they allowed no depreciation for his buildings, his fences, his work animals, his breeding animals, and his soil. If they had allowed those items there would have been no income to agriculture whatever. Yet by law we have given the banking interests this special privilege over the farmers, even taking their own deposits away from them where they can not borrow them for use in their own business any longer.

Not only that, but there are the public utilities, the courts giving them 7 per cent, which is the least return I have heard under any decision. The American people, according to Mr. Hoover's own figures, are only producing 5½ per cent of wealth increase in this whole country, with all the labor, with all the capital, with the increase in property values, with the decline of the dollar, and everything else. Then we have our tariff protection that enables the protected manufacturer to fix the price of his products at his factory. He has no foreign competition. Then we have patent protection that gives the patented industries special rights created by law. All these privileges have been created by law; but when the farmers come here and say that Congress owes it to them by law to create an export corporation that will relieve them of this discrimination, that is a socialistic scheme, and the East can not stand for it.

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. A group of Senators from our part of the country have been considering this bill for the last several days and have agreed upon a certain number of amendments. This group of Senators have asked me to offer these amendments for and on behalf of each of them and of myself. These amendments have been agreed to be accepted by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] as far as he can do so. I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be printed in the RECORD, and also that they be printed in the usual way and lie on the table for the use of Senators.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, what objection would there be to having them read now?

Mr. McKELLAR. I should be very happy to have them read now.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I state, following the statement of the Senator from Tennessee, that I feel very kindly toward the purposes of the amendments. I have not said that I would accept them. That is subject to debate and explanation; but I want it understood that there is no obligation resting upon me to accept each and every amendment in its present form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the request of the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I trust that these amendments may be printed. I have no especial objection to their being read, but they can not be understood unless they are considered in connection with the context; and I think it would be better to have them printed, so that each Senator can get the amendments to-morrow morning and read them in connection with their context in the bill.

I want to say that I sincerely trust that the Senator from Oregon will give his assent to these various amendments. I have myself discussed all of them with him. They have been drawn up after conferences with him, and I did not think he would have any hesitation in throwing the weight of his acceptance in their favor. Of course, that does not relieve the Senate of its power to pass upon the question of whether or not it will accept his suggestion, but it does add the weight of his suggestion in favor of the amendments.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think I made myself clearly understood. I feel very kindly disposed toward them all, and as far as I can, perhaps I shall accept them as one Member of the Senate; but, as I said, there will be some argument and some discussion, and I want some of them explained.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator right now sees no reason why he can not accept these amendments?

Mr. McNARY. Not as I feel at this moment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Alabama and to the Senate that the form in which the amendments are now presented refers to various parts of the bill; and I believe it will be better, rather than have them read, that the Senator take them in the morning and compare them with the bill itself.

I can say to the Senator that they provide for two substantial changes. The first is in reference to the advisory commodity council. Under the bill, they are appointed by the farm board. Under these various amendments referring to that particular situation, the advisory commodity council will be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

The commodity councils must be producers of the commodity which they are appointed to represent. They are to be selected by the President, and he may use for his consideration lists which are furnished by farmers' organizations. The term of office is two years, and vacancies are to be filled by the President. These commodity councils, under the proposed amendment, become a very real part of the organization created by the bill.

In a subsequent section it is provided that no marketing period shall be begun or terminated for a commodity without the approval of the majority of the council for such commodity.

It is also provided that in all matters concerning that commodity the advisory council shall have a veto or check upon the farm board. It is just the same as having two Houses of Congress instead of one, except that the advisory council does not have anything to do with the administration of the act, nor do the members have salaries, nor are they in an equal position.

I will say that, in my judgment, these provisions making the advisory council a real part of the organization greatly strengthen the bill.

The next most important part of the bill is the provision increasing the revolving fund from $250,000,000 to $400,000,000, and setting apart $200,000,000 of said fund to be used by the board as a stabilization fund for financing the purchase, withholding, or the disposal of agricultural products as provided in the bill, and that this fund be allocated ratably to the several products according to the values of their exportable surpluses.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, have I the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho is entitled to the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator objects to my going on, I will desist.

Mr. BORAH. As these amendments have to be printed, every Senator will examine them for himself; and I am very anxious to get a matter of executive business disposed of.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then I will say to the Senator that these are the principal amendments.

I will now ask unanimous consent that they be printed and lie on the table, and also that they be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request is granted.

Mr. McKELLAR's amendments are as follows:

Amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. McKELLAR to the bill (S. 3555) to establish a Federal farm board to aid in the orderly marketing and in the control and disposition of the surplus of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce, viz:

On page 3, line 21, after the word "States," insert the following: "shall be the producer of some one or more agricultural products or shall be interested in and truly representative of agriculture."

On page 5, after line 15, insert the following: "No action having a general application to any one commodity shall be taken by the board unless first approved by a majority of the advisory council."

On page 5 strike out line 17 and down through the period in line 1, on page 6, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 4. (a) Whenever the board determines that any agricultural commodity may thereafter require stabilization by the board through marketing agreements authorized by this act, or whenever the cooperative associations or other organizations representative of the producers of the commodity shall apply to the board for the creation and appointment of the advisory council for such commodity, then the board shall notify the President of such determination or application. The President shall thereupon create an advisory council for the commodity. The advisory council shall be composed of seven members, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. No individual shall be eligible for appointment to a commodity advisory council unless he resides in the region in which the commodity is principally grown and is a producer of the commodity. Prior to the making of any appointment to a commodity advisory council the board shall transmit to the President for his consideration lists of individuals qualified for appointment, to be submitted to the board by cooperative associations or other organizations representative of the producers of the commodity. The term of office of a member of any commodity advisory council shall be two years. In the event of a vacancy occurring, the President shall fill such vacancy in the same manner as the originally appointed member, and, should Congress not be in session, such appointee shall hold office until 20 days after the convening of the next session of Congress."

On page 7 after line 11 insert the following: "No marketing period shall be begun or terminated for any commodity under the provisions of this act without the approval of a majority of the advisory council for such commodity."

On page 10, line 20, after the word "board," insert the following: "Shall submit its findings to the advisory council of the particular commodity concerned, and, if such findings are concurred in by a majority of said advisory council, then the board."

On page 11, line 2, strike out all after the word "as" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "The board finds that such arrangements are no longer necessary or advisable for carrying out the policy in section 1, and if such findings are concurred in by a majority of the advisory council."

On page 13, after word "or," line 19, insert "After giving 12 months' notice to the advisory council of the commodity affected."

On page 13, after the word "office," in line 24, insert "and the approval of the majority of the advisory council."

On page 15, line 2, strike out all after the period and down through the word "publish" in line 4 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Upon the basis of such estimates there shall be from time to time determined, and if such estimates are concurred in by a majority of the advisory council for such commodity, the board shall publish."

On page 15, line 13, insert "The equalization fee herein provided for upon any commodity shall not be imposed until the same is approved by a majority of the advisory council for that commodity."

On page 15, line 15, strike out "determined upon" and insert "so published."

On page 17, line 20, after the word "transit," insert "or sale for purely local consumption."

On page 20, line 23, after the word "board," insert the following: "Upon recommendation of a majority of the advisory council of the particular commodity."

On page 24, line 1, strike out "two hundred and fifty million" and insert "four hundred million."

On page 24, after line 6, insert the following: "Provided, That $200,000,000 of said revolving fund is hereby made available and shall be used as a stabilization fund for financing the purchasing, withholding, or the disposal of exportable agricultural products in the event that a marketing period shall be declared for one or more of such products as hereinbefore authorized, and that said fund shall be allocated ratably to the stabilization funds of the several products according to the values of their respective exportable surpluses."

On page 26, after line 21, insert the following: "The word 'majority' means a majority of the whole board or advisory council authorized to be appointed."

ARTICLE BY HON. MILLARD E. TYDINGS ON NONEXISTENCE OF "INTOLERANT" SOUTH

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, in reading the New York Times yesterday I saw a very interesting article from the pen of the junior Senator from Maryland, Mr. TYDINGS, entitled "'Intolerant' South held nonexistent." I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHORTRIDGE in the chair). Without objection, the request is granted.

The matter referred to is here printed, as follows:

"INTOLERANT" SOUTH HELD NONEXISTENT—RELIGIOUS BIAS BELOW MASON AND DIXON LINE IS DENIED BY MARYLAND SENATOR—CITES HISTORICAL PROOFS—PRESENT KU-KLUX KLAN, HE ASSERTS, BROUGHT UNDESERVED ODIUM ON SOUTHERN STATES

By MILLARD E. TYDINGS, United States Senator from Maryland

Are the people of the South more intolerant than their neighbors of the North?

Because the present-day Ku-Klux Klan had its origin in the South, in Georgia, and particularly since the recent attacks upon the Roman Catholic Church made in the Senate by a Southern Senator, J. THOMAS HEFLIN, of Alabama, the assertion is frequently made that the South is a section of religious prejudices. It is even contended that the South, because of these prejudices, would go to the political extreme of repudiating the Democratic Party should it place a Roman Catholic on its presidential ticket.

If the South chooses to deny that the people of that section are less tolerant than those of any other, historical facts may be cited with which to support such denial. Indeed, a study of American history inclines one to the opinion that there have been less of bigotry and religious intolerance south of the Mason and Dixon line than in any other part of the country.

If the recent attacks upon the Catholic Church by Senator HEFLIN be cited as proof of southern intolerance, and it be asserted that he speaks for a great many of the southern people, it may be replied that it was another southern Senator, JOSEPH T. ROBINSON of Arkansas, Democratic leader in the Senate, who replied and denied that the Alabama Senator voiced the sentiment of a majority of the southern people. It may be added, also, when Senator HEFLIN challenged a vote of Democratic Senators on the issue raised by the Heflin-Robinson debate, that of the Democratic Senators present when the vote was taken only one withheld a vote of confidence in the Democratic leader of the Senate. It is further true that in the widespread comment by leading southern newspapers on the Heflin-Robinson incident, almost without exception Senator ROBINSON was praised and Senator HEFLIN was condemned.

SENATOR REED'S REPLY

The South could cite the further fact that during the last Congress, when Senator HEFLIN concluded a similar attack on the Catholic Church, it was Senator JAMES A. REED of Missouri, another Southern State, who arose in his place and uttered these memorable words:

"The spirit of real religion is that of tolerance. Bigotry has no place beneath the spire of a Protestant tabernacle, under the cross of a Catholic church, or within the walls of a Jewish synagogue. If this country is to live, then these fountain springs bearing the pure waters of liberty must not be polluted with the poison of hate, covered with the slime of proscription, or polluted by the spirit of intolerance."

These are among the replies the South might make to the charge of intolerance.

But to go back through history and trace the record. It may not be truthfully denied that there are bigotry and intolerance in the South, as elsewhere in America. There have been ever since the landing of the Mayflower. Indeed, the seeds of intolerance in English America were first sown in New England soil, not in a southern colony. When the Puritans in England were preparing for their voyage across the Atlantic to the New World, a paper was circulated among them setting forth reasons and arguments for making the journey. The very first reason assigned in this paper was "the glory of opposing the French Jesuits in Canada and of raising a particular church in New England." The quotation is from the recent work of Perry Belmont, Religious Tolerance From Roger Williams to Jefferson, in which R. C. Winthrop's Life and Letters of John Winthrop is cited.

MARYLAND'S CONTRIBUTION

In contrast with the intolerance which prevailed in the New England colony was the establishment of the colony of Maryland, where the tree of tolerance and real religious freedom was first planted on English soil in America and where that tree has reached its fullest fruition, and Maryland is called to this day the "Free State." Maryland's most famous citizen was Charles Carroll of Carrollton, a Catholic, signer of the Declaration of Independence and subsequently United States Senator.

The contribution of the Southern State of Virginia to the spirit of tolerance and religious freedom was the famous statute of religious freedom, fathered by Thomas Jefferson and supported by Madison, Monroe, Patrick Henry, and other great Virginians and southerners of that period. It was the influence of Madison, supported by that of Jefferson, which wrote into the American Constitution the declaration that "Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." Jefferson wrote in his Notes on Religion that "It's the refusing toleration to those of a different opinion which has produced all the bustles and wars on account of religion."

It was James Madison, the Father of the Constitution, who declared during debate in an early Congress when the alien law, passed under the Presidency of the first Adams, was pending that "there is nothing in their [Catholic] religion inconsistent with the purest republicanism."

If it was in Virginia, where a statute of religious liberty was first adopted, it was in New York that, through the influence of John Jay, the Federalist, a provision was written into the Constitution denying the privilege of citizenship to Catholics unless they abjured and renounced their allegiance to the Pope "in matters ecclesiastical"—not merely in civil or temporal matters but in everything that related to their religious faith. This provision remained in that Constitution until 1821.

New Jersey had in its constitution a provision equally obnoxious to Catholics, and it was not until 1833 that Massachusetts repealed a tax for the support of the established Protestant Church and collected it from Protestants and Catholics alike.

It was not until 1877, barely more than a half century ago, that New Hampshire repealed a provision of her constitution under which Catholics were ineligible to hold public office. Yet it was Senator GEORGE MOSES, of that State, who, following the recent Heflin-Robinson debate in the Senate, taunted the Democrats in the Senate on the "Republican" speeches which had just been made by the southern Democrats on the issue of religious tolerance.

There were other instances of constitutional and statutory proscription of Catholics in Northern States, but so far as a fairly careful study discloses no southern State has ever made a man's religious faith a test of his fitness for office or has ever denied to Catholic or Jew any of the privileges or rights enjoyed by Protestants. Certainly no southern State or colony ever went to the extreme of the New England colony which, in its "blue laws," prohibited the discharging of firearms on the Sabbath unless they were aimed at "an Indian, a wolf, or a Catholic priest."

THE KLAN STANDS ALONE

With the single exception of the present-day Ku-Klux Klan, no anti-Catholic or anti-Jewish organization of importance has ever had its origin in the South. There have been four such movements in the country that have become important. They were the Native American movement of the first quarter of the last century, the Know-Nothing Party of the fifties, the American Protective Association of the nineties, and the present-day Knights of the Ku-Klux Klan.

The Native American movement was really a movement inside the Federalist, the dominant party of the early years of the nineteenth century. It made numerous efforts to write its principles into the legislation and policies of the Government. Those principles were: Proscription of those who professed the Roman Catholic faith and exclusion of foreign-born citizens from all public offices, national, State, and local. For the most part, these efforts were unsuccessful, exceptions being the alien and sedition laws of the John Adams administration. All such efforts were strongly, and, for the most part, successfully resisted by the Democratic-Republican Party, then fast growing under the cultivation of Jefferson and Madison. Undoubtedly much of the anti-Irish and anti-Catholic feeling of the day was due to the prejudices of the Tories of the Revolutionary period and a few years thereafter. They were pro-English and most of them were members of the Established Church of England. They strongly resisted the efforts of Patrick Henry and Thomas Jefferson and others to disestablish that church in Virginia and elsewhere in the colonies. In part, too, this accounts for the Irish coming to America, joining the party of Jefferson, the Tories being almost wholly in the Federalist ranks.

With the possible exception of the Ku-Klux Klan of this day, it was the Know-Nothing Party of the fifties which attracted the largest membership to its ranks and became the most important political factor in the country of all of the movements based upon religious or racial prejudices. This party was formally organized in New York City in 1852. Its purposes were declared to be to "resist the insidious policy of the Church of Rome" and to "place in all offices of honor, trust, or profit in the gift of the people or by appointment none but native American Protestant citizens." It was a revival of the Native American Party of a half century earlier.

NOT POPULAR IN THE SOUTH

The Know-Nothing Party gained many successes in municipal elections, winning control in numerous northern and eastern cities and electing its candidates for governor in New York, Connecticut, Rhode Island, and New Hampshire. But it made very little headway in the South and sustained a notable reverse in Virginia, where Henry Wise was elected governor on his antagonism to "Know-Nothingism." In the presidential campaign of 1856 this party nominated former President Millard Fillmore, of New York, for President. As Jefferson and Madison had answered a similar challenge a half century earlier, the Democratic Party met the issue raised by "Know-Nothingism" in 1856 by writing into the platform of its convention at Cincinnati the following plank:

"A political crusade in the nineteenth century and in the United States of America against a Catholic and foreign born is neither justified by the past history nor the future prospects of the country, nor in unison with the spirit of toleration and enlarged freedom which peculiarly distinguishes the American system of popular Government."

This convention was dominated by southerners. It nominated James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, for the Presidency. He was elected, receiving 174 electoral votes to 114 cast for Frémont and but 8 for Fillmore. Frémont was the nominee of the Republican Party, which entered the political arena in that year. Its convention, held in Philadelphia, denounced slavery and polygamy but did not meet the challenge of religious bigotry.

Feeling ran very high during the period of "Know-Nothingism," from 1851 to 1858, and there were numerous riots and considerable bloodshed. Catholic churches, schools, and convents were attacked, some were burned, some blown up. The rioting was especially vicious in Philadelphia and in certain sections in New England, but with the single exception of Louisville, Ky., a border city, there was no serious disturbances anywhere in the South.

THE "A. P. A." INFLUENCE

The next important movement of the kind was the American Protective Association of the nineties. The first "council" of the A. P. A., as it came to be commonly known, was organized in Clinton, Iowa, in March, 1887. Its national president was William S. Linton, a Republican Member of Congress from Michigan. Its members were bound to "place political positions in the hands of Protestants to the exclusion of the Roman Catholics." It first appeared as a serious factor in politics in Omaha, Nebr., in the municipal election of 1891, when the society indorsed the Republican ticket and swept the city by a heavy majority. When it spread across the border into the South and demanded of Gov. William J. Stone, of Missouri, later United States Senator, that he blacklist all Catholics in making appointments to office, he replied:

"Your association is undemocratic and un-American, and I am opposed to it. I haven't a drop of Know-Nothing blood in my veins."

Although the A. P. A. party spread through the North and East and gained political dominance in many cities from 1893 to 1896, it made little headway in the South except in the border cities of Louisville and St. Louis. Many Democratic conventions, local and State, denounced the movement, and the answer to its challenge made by President William McKinley was to appoint Joseph McKenna, of California, a Catholic, to his Cabinet and later to the Supreme Court.

Thus it will be seen that with the exception of the present-day Ku-Klux Klan, none of the antichurch or antiracial movements had its origin in the South or made any serious headway in that section. It may be inserted here that the Ku-Klux Klan was really organized in Georgia as an antiracial rather than a religious movement; also that while it gained a very large following in that section, it has died away with almost as much rapidity, and it is now generally believed that its membership is much greater in certain Northern States, notably Pennsylvania and Indiana, than in any Southern State.

NO PREJUDICE IN POLITICS

In the South's history the names of many Catholics and Jews are written in large letters, and the people of that section have honored many men of the Catholic and Jewish faiths with high public positions. The parents of Jefferson Davis, President of the Confederacy, must have felt no prejudice against the Catholic Church, for they kept him in a Catholic school for two years; and in his autobiography he wrote most cordially and appreciatively of his associations during that period of his life. In making up his cabinet President Davis named Stephen R. Mallory, of Florida, as Secretary of the Navy. He was a Catholic and had been a member of the United States Senate from Florida. Judah P. Benjamin, of Louisiana, a Jew, was appointed Attorney General by President Davis, and later was transferred to the War Department. The second Stephen R. Mallory, also a Catholic, was Senator from Florida from 1896 until his death in 1907, being succeeded by the present senior Senator from that State, DUNCAN U. FLETCHER. Before entering the Senate the younger Mallory was for two years Representative of one of the Florida districts in the House of Representatives.

The most brilliant naval officer in the Confederate service was Admiral Raphael Semmes, of Alabama, commander of the raider Alabama. He, too, was a Catholic. A cousin, Thomas Semmes, one of the most noted attorneys of Louisiana, was one of the Senators from that State in the Confederate Congress.

Some of the most brilliant generals in the Confederate Army were Catholics, notably P. G. T. Beauregard, of Louisiana, and Gen. James Longstreet, of Georgia, the latter a convert to the Catholic faith.

In the late World War many of the men called to important posts were members of the Catholic or Jewish faiths. Lieut. Gen. Robert L. Bullard, of the Army, and Admiral W. S. Benson, of the Navy, were Catholics. President Wilson, a Virginia Democrat, chose for his private secretary Joseph Tumulty, of New Jersey, a Catholic; Edward N. Hurley, chairman of the Shipping Board, a Catholic, and Bernard Baruch, chairman of the War Industries Board, a Jew, were among other appointments made by President Wilson; but probably the most notable of his entire eight years in the Presidency was the appointment of Louis D. Brandeis, of Massachusetts, a Jew, to the United States Supreme Court.

SOUTHERN CHIEF JUSTICE

Two southerners have presided as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States—Roger B. Taney, of Maryland, and Edward D. White, of Louisiana, both members of the Catholic faith.

In the present Congress there are 5 Senators and 35 Representatives who are communicants of the Catholic Church. Three of the Senators are from the South, RANSDELL and BROUSSARD, of Louisiana, and ASHURST, of Arizona. In neither of these States is the Catholic population in the majority. Before he entered the Senate, Senator RANSDELL was for 14 years a member of the House of Representatives from a Louisiana district in which less than 5 per cent of the population are Catholics. In all his long public career the religious issue has not been raised. On the other hand, one of the present members of the House of Representatives from Louisiana is WHITMELL P. MARTIN, a Protestant, whose district is almost as overwhelmingly Catholic as the old Ransdell district is Protestant. Yet he has represented the district for 20 years, and his Catholic constituency has not raised the religious issue against him.

The South has not forgotten and will never forget that when Jefferson Davis, the Confederate president, was in irons, charged with treason, it was Charles O'Conor, the brilliant New York attorney, a Catholic, who prosecuted and convicted "Boss" Tweed, who came to his defense. It is the general belief that it was the appearance of O'Conor in the case that caused the Federal authorities to withdraw the charges lodged against Davis and to strike the shackles from his limbs. It was this same O'Conor who was subsequently nominated for the Presidency by a faction of the Democratic Party. This was in 1872. Although he declined to make the race, some 30,000 voters wrote out their ballots that they might cast them for him.

It may be said that the list of Catholics and Jews in the foregoing who have been honored by the people of the South is not long, that relatively the number is few as compared with all who have held high office in the South. To that it may be replied that the list is not a full one, and if it were, it may be further added that relatively there are few Catholics and Jews in the South.

The list of Catholics and Jews whom the electorate of the South have honored would indicate that in the past, at least, the South has not made religious faith a test of fitness for public office, and that when her sons were donning the gray to follow Lee and Jackson to glorious defeat, the accidents of birth and religious convictions were not made a test of fitness to serve or command.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, April 9, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, Thou knowest our frame and art touched with a feeling of our infirmities; Thou dost condescend to hear our prayer. In some strange way the storm winds and the port are friends. Do Thou touch the eternal in us. Awaken in us the deepest concern to feel Thy presence, to be stirred by Thy truth, to have faith in the unseen, and to follow the aspiration to leap over the boundary of time. Devoid of these, we may yield to that which destroys character, defeats progress, and forbids happiness. Whatever the exactions of each day may be, teach us to be patient and zealous. Come with us, bless us, and help us to dignify common toil and to consecrate the hard, homely things of life, and to pass on to others sweet charity and cloudless hope. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, April 6, 1928, was read and approved.

NATIONAL FOREST—CARSON

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 9829) to extend the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 20, 1922, entitled "An act to consolidate national forest lands," with Senate amendments, and agree to the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Mexico asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 9829) and agree to the Senate amendments. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were read.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article on the Jones flood control bill from the St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the St. Louis Globe-Democrat:

COOLIDGE GOING WRONG

The Senate by a unanimous vote passed the Jones flood control bill last week. The House Special Committee on Flood Control has laid aside the bill which it had prepared and introduced and by a vote of 20 to 1 has recommended the passage of the Senate bill. It has been the general belief in Washington that this bill would come before the House for its vote as soon as its rules of procedure would permit, and it has been anticipated that this would be within a week, and that the House would pass it quickly and by a large majority.

But now an obstacle to this consummation appears in the attitude of President Coolidge. We are told that he is dissatisfied with the bill as amended and passed by the Senate, and that unless materially altered by the House he will oppose it. It is even intimated that if passed as it is, or without alteration to suit him, he will veto it.

One objection he is said to raise is that it does not definitely specify the cost of the work. The bill authorizes the expenditure of $325,000,000, but that sum, it is generally conceded, is a preliminary estimate, and the actual cost may be double that amount. The estimate of the Army engineers for the Jadwin plan is about $290,000,000; that of the Mississippi River Commission for its smaller plan is about $400,000,000, and for its larger plan around $700,000,000. With the authority given to the board of engineers created by the bill to harmonize the two plans, it is obvious that the cost can not be specified in the bill. Nor would it mean anything if it were attempted. The work must be done, whatever the cost. The country, we think, has fully made up its mind as to that. It will be the business of Congress and of the agencies which it puts in charge of the work to see that no money is wasted, but no one can say definitely what it will cost until it is finished. The Panama Canal project was inaugurated with an authorized expenditure of about $140,000,000, but its actual cost was approximately $375,000,000, and it is worth every dollar of it and more.

If the President has actually raised this objection, it seems to us to be mere quibbling over intangibles. It is more likely that his primary objection arises from his belief that the States affected should bear a considerable share of the future cost of the work. The Jadwin plan provided for this participation and the President has insisted upon it. The Jones bill originally contained provisions for some division of future costs, but these were eliminated in the committee, and the principle of participation was considered to be sufficiently recognized in crediting to these States the $290,000,000 they have already expended for flood protection. When it is recalled that the flood of last year cost them upward of $200,000,000, it would seem to be as unjust as it is unwise to lay further burdens upon them in relation to a matter that is fundamentally a national obligation. The Jones bill respects the position taken by the President to the extent of declaring the principle of local participation sound, "as recognizing the special interest of the local population in its own protection, and as a means of preventing inordinate requests for unjustified items of work having no material national interest." While we do not regard the principle itself as sound, as applied to the project in question, because it is there impracticable, yet the language of the bill is warranted under the circumstances because the action in this case should not establish a precedent for future demands upon Congress. But with this declaration incorporated in the bill the statement of Mr. MADDEN, chairman of the Appropriations Committee, after he had discussed the subject with President Coolidge, that the bill "would commit the Government to every creek that is out of banks when it rains" becomes sheer nonsense. The bill commits the Government to nothing but this particular job, and to the consideration of future action in regard to the tributaries of the Mississippi.

The President's attitude in relation to this bill is not reasonable, nor is it marked by that comprehension of the vast national significance of this matter which a chief executive should have. We believe the unanimous action of the Senate expresses the feeling and the desire of the country to deal with this subject in the large way its importance demands, and we do not believe the people will countenance any failure of Congress to give legislative effect to their wishes. The House should proceed with the passage of the Jones bill and it should be made a law regardless of the narrow view of the President. It is to be hoped that he will not carry his opposition to the point of veto, but if he should, Congress would be fully justified in overriding the veto. Indeed, it would merit public condemnation if it did not do so.

AN EASTER IN THE NATION'S CAPITAL

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein an article entitled "An Easter in the National Capital," written by Col. C. B. Douglass, of Oklahoma.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an article written by Col. C. B. Douglass, of Oklahoma. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, how long is the article?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Very short.

Mr. SNELL. This is going pretty far to print general newspaper articles in the RECORD.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. It is not a general newspaper article.

Mr. CRAMTON. I had supposed that editorials were under the ban.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. This is a patriotic article, one that I think anybody in the Nation would be interested in reading.

Mr. SNELL. The question is whether it is of national interest.

Mr. CRAMTON. I think it would be of as much interest as the editorial that has just been allowed to be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. SNELL. What was that?

Mr. CRAMTON. An editorial attacking the position of the President on flood control.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article entitled "An Easter in the Nation's Capital," written by Col. C. B. Douglass, of Oklahoma:

What a wonderful thing it is to be alive this Easter morning, April 8, in the good year of our Lord 1928, and in addition to being alive how good it is to be in the Nation's beautiful Capital City, Washington, so rich in history, legend, and patriotic lore. The skies blue as eyes of a dream girl and a warmth of sun brilliant, stimulating and soul-satisfying as a southern welcome.

What a crowded morning is offered, appealing to all the senses in all that goes to make life more sublime and more worth the living, and how fortunate it is to be able to sense it all, to appreciate it all, and to enter into and enjoy the God-given blessings of this day and of this place.

Early it was when after the morning meal with pipe going, I started on an aimless tour, setting out from my hotel, alone, to go wherever chance directed. Up the Avenue I crossed Fifteenth Street and emerging from the hurrying Easter throngs found myself in Sherman Park.

There I made obeisance to my old hero, General Sherman, mounted on his bronzed steed atop his granite pedestal, and greeting him I asked his companionship for a stroll. I was then no longer alone but went with him to Bull Run, Donaldson, Henry, Shiloh, Kennesaw Mountain, Vicksburg, Resseca, Dalton, and on to Atlanta.

From the capital of Georgia we marched together to the sea, then came Savannah and Columbus, the surrender of Johnston, southern legions, and the return to Washington with the best army, man for man, ever assembled on this or any other continent. Together we marched up Pennsylvania Avenue in the great parade to the reviewing stand where his chieftain, Grant, greeted him as his greatest soldier. There I left him to again take his place mounted on his bronze steed atop his granite pedestal, where with a fame as enduring as his monument, he looks out over the city he did so much to save, secure from the blasts of hatred and forever safe in the love-enshrined hearts of his countrymen.

On I strolled, lured by the fragrance of the cherry blossoms, bringing with them a glimpse of old Japan, blooming in their virgin purity from their swaying boughs, and on my way paused to greet the man who made this Nation and this city possible.

Washington, the man, to me spoke from every stone in the towering shaft which bears his name, and after my homage to him, together we went to Yorktown, to Valley Forge, to the frozen fields along the Delaware and the ice-blown crossing with his hungry, footsore, and bleeding comrades. Then, to the Capital where he put away the crown and gave to his countrymen that farewell address which told almost like written history, that which should come to the Nation he created after he and his hearers had passed on into the vale.

Then to the beautiful shaded lawn of Mount Vernon, we wended our mental way and watched the waters of the Potomac flowing to the sea, with the azure hills as a background, a fitting retreat for him who, at the close of such a life, lies down to a dreamless sleep.

There I left him with a wreath of love and affection on his tomb and I was a better man for the journey we had just completed.

On I went, and on to the placid lakes and lagoons where, in a bewildering mass of foliage with colors running riot, thousands of happy visitors gaily attired, of all ages, were absorbed in the beauty of the scene. Men and women, elderly and happy, brushed elbows with youth and maiden, bright-eyed and animated, strolling arm in arm, and children in an ecstasy of joy shouted in their joy of living.

On blooded hunters, gaily costumed in colors matching all the radiant flowers, men and women crowded the bridle paths. From the double-decked sight-seeing cars to the old-time bicycle the driveways were crowded to capacity.

Overhead droned the motors of the monoplanes and the biplane with aerial sightseers, and on the lakes and lagoons white sails gleamed in the sunlight to the ringing calls and shouting laughter of the merry-making crews aboard the gull-winged craft. Marines and soldiers in brightest uniforms added color to the scene. Artists, with easels set, painted vigorously, cameras clicked, movie men went into action, and kodak parties were making permanent, as near as may be, the fleeting riches such a day brings to the life of those who, having eyes, can see and, having souls, can understand.

On past the unfinished arches of the memorial bridge spanning the stately river I went and visualized what it will be when, leading to the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier, it will link with beauty and with art by a trail millions will travel the city beautiful with the resting place of so many of our Nation's great.

Climbing a slight elevation, I felt again another presence and again I knew I was not alone. Before the Nation's shrine I bowed my head in reverence, and when looking up greeted one who of all the rest is to me the most sublime, the most majestic, and yet the saddest figure in our history. Lincoln, who felt the full blow as Sumter was first fired upon and whose heart was almost crushed by the cannon's blast directed by the champions of the stars and bars. Lincoln, who met his disordered, disorganized troops on the rout from Bull Run, who saw his generals—McClellan, McDowell, Hooker, Buell, and Frémont—fail where success should have been certain, and who saw his armies bruised and beaten from battle field to battle field during those depressing days of sixty-one and sixty-two.

Lincoln, whose great heart bled with every wound the Nation suffered and, who in the stillness of the nights paced the floor saddened and alone and bore the burdens of his Nation's sorrow. Lincoln who broke the shackles from a million slaves and made of them human beings in law and in fact. Lincoln, the towering figure of all time in our Nation's history, who with the years grows greater and from whose life there is inspiration for all men.

Our Lincoln, my Lincoln of the log cabin, greeted me as seated in his marble chair he looks out over the mirrored lake to the monument of the man who created the Nation he had saved. Lincoln looking further to the matchless dome of the Capitol he defended. Lincoln who through the years of blood and tears moved always to the day of peace for a reunited country, "with charity toward all, with malice toward none." With Lincoln and his inspired memories I spent the most impressive hour of my life, and as I made my way back to the hotel, past the buildings dedicated to art, to the Latin American, to Peace, to the State, the Navy, and the Army, and on past the historic white mansion so hallowed by the names of Presidents living and dead, I to myself again said: What a wonderful thing it is to be alive this Easter morning, April 8, in the good year of our Lord 1928, and being alive to be in this, the Nation's beautiful Capital City, Washington.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I have stated it to the Speaker in chambers and he recognized it as a question of privilege. Shall I restate it?

The SPEAKER. It should be restated to the House.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, without any foundation whatever therefor, and it being wholly false, on Saturday, March 31, 1928, the Washington Times in three several editions that afternoon in headings, in box-car letters an inch high, black face, printed the following: In one edition it had "BLANTON nabbed." In the next edition it had "Police nabbed BLANTON." In the next edition it had "BLANTON pulled."

In a subsequent issue it had the following head: "BLANTON made cop sign false paper." I submit to the Speaker that constitutes a privilege, and I ask permission to be recognized for an hour under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts whether what the policeman did to BLANTON establishes a question of privilege, but thinks that what he did to the policeman would. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHAFER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BLANTON. I refuse to yield for a parliamentary inquiry; I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas declines to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, that paper on this afternoon of March 31 printed five different editions here in Washington, and in every one of those editions it had a new heading in box-car letters indicating that I had been arrested on New Hampshire Avenue for speeding. It was wholly false. There was not a word of truth in it. There was not even any foundation for it.

It was a deliberate attempt by high police officials in the police department who, as a member of the Gibson committee I had been helping to investigate with respect to their improper conduct and improper actions. This paper went on to say that I was arrested on New Hempshire Avenue by a traffic policeman, Dalton E. Galimore, and that in the special drive to stop speeders on New Hampshire Avenue, I was the first one to be arrested.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that, if the gentleman is going to be heard, he must confine himself to the question of what he did to the police.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, well; that is the whole proposition.

Mr. SNELL. I do not propose to have that whole matter retried in the House of Representatives. If the gentleman wants to take the time of the House of Representatives in presenting this matter he must confine himself to the question of privilege.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that this interruption be not taken out of my time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is point in what the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] says. The Chair does not think the headlines in the newspapers of themselves constitute a question of personal privilege. The Chair does think that the implication that the gentleman from Texas compelled a policeman to sign false statements does raise a question of personal privilege. The Chair thinks the gentleman should confine himself to that as closely as possible.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall show exactly what the situation is. I ask that the Clerk read in my time the following affidavit, which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, who made the affidavit?

Mr. BLANTON. Dalton E. Galimore.

Mr. SCHAFER. I shall not object.

The Clerk read as follows:

The DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA:

I, Dalton E. Galimore, being duly sworn, upon oath state:

I am a motor-cycle patrolman in the traffic division of the Metropolitan Police Department of the District of Columbia, and am the one whom the press Saturday reported to have arrested Congressman THOMAS L. BLANTON for speeding.

All of said press reports were absolutely false and were manufactured, without any basis or foundation therefor whatever.

From his residence on Irving Street NW. Congressman BLANTON would naturally turn into Sherman Avenue, then Florida Avenue, and then into New Jersey Avenue for the most direct route to his office.

On Saturday morning about 8.30 o'clock Congressman BLANTON in his car turned from Irving Street into and down Sherman Avenue, following in behind a continuous stream of cars in front of him and with the usual stream of cars behind him that come down this arterial highway each morning going to work.

There was a slow truck ahead, and I saw the stream of cars all turn around it, being just behind Congressman BLANTON'S car, and he kept his place in said line of cars and at no time turned or passed any of them ahead of him, there being at least 30 cars in sight ahead of him in this procession.

Congressman BLANTON was not speeding, and at no time violated any provision of the law, and at no time did I stop him, and at no time did I call him down.

As I was traveling in his direction, I found myself cruising along by the side of his car, and as he and I are well acquainted I saluted him as a friend, which friendly salutation he returned, and he told me to turn into the curb on Sherman Avenue, just opposite the Garfield Hospital, as he wanted to talk to me, and we both turned to the curb, and he then asked me about the facts in my case, when an attempt had been made to "frame" me with false testimony, when certain enemies had charged me with bootlegging. I answered all of his questions and gave him all the data he asked for, and then I went on to my work, and he went on down Sherman Avenue to the Capitol to his office.

Instead of my having stopped him, it was he who stopped me, and called me to the curb to get information, just as he has talked to me several times before, in his work checking up District business.

When I went to the traffic bureau I casually mentioned to Inspector Brown that I had had a conversation with Congressman BLANTON that morning as I was coming down Sherman Avenue from my home to work. He asked me how the cars were running on Sherman Avenue, and I told him all right, that I had arrested one man that morning for speeding 35 miles per hour, and his case is to be tried to-night in court. If anyone mixed this conversation up by connecting Congressman BLANTON with it, they had no foundation for it whatever, as I made no charge whatever against him in any way whatever.

Shortly thereafter a press reporter with his camera came to me and wanted to take my picture, as the one who arrested Congressman BLANTON, I told him that such assertion was a lie, and that if he didn't leave me I would "bust both him and his camera up."

Later that day another press reporter came to me and said he had heard that I had shot at Congressman BLANTON to stop him, and I told him it was a lie; that at no time was Congressman BLANTON speeding or in any way violating the law, and that he was never on New Hampshire Avenue that morning.

Later another press reporter came to me with a camera, and I told him that such report of speeding was a lie, and he had better not publish it. I thus notified them long before they published it.

On Saturday night after 11 o'clock one of the editors of the Herald rang me at my home and said he was publishing a hot editorial about BLANTON'S arrest, and I told him he had better not do it, as it was all a lie, and I wouldn't stand for it.

(Signed) DALTON E. GALIMORE.

Sworn to and subscribed by said Dalton E. Galimore before me on this the 2d day of April, 1928, at my office in Washington, D. C.

[SEAL.] ELTON J. LAYTON,
Notary Public in and for the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the notary public who swore Mr. Galimore to that affidavit is our highly respected clerk of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House—a splendid gentleman, and many of you know him.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER. Who wrote the draft of the affidavit?

Mr. BLANTON. It was prepared in my office, covering statements detailed by Galimore himself. I now ask that the Clerk read in my time the following affidavit from Mr. Elton J. Layton, who is the clerk of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, are we going to get full information as to how these affidavits were prepared and who prepared them?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I am going to give the House all of them. They were prepared in my office upon statements detailed by the affiants themselves.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA:

I, Elton J. Layton, being duly sworn, upon oath, state: I am the clerk of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce employed by the House of Representatives of the United States. I am a notary public, and am the same officer, who, on last Monday, April 2, 1928, administered the oath to Dalton E. Galimore when he executed an affidavit before me in my office in the House Office Building. Before I administered the oath to said Galimore, he stated to me that he himself had read over the affidavit and was familiar with its contents, whereupon he made oath before me that such statements contained in said affidavit were true and correct.

Before leaving my office, said Galimore stated to me that the press reports stating that he had stopped Congressman BLANTON for speeding were ridiculous, and that he always brought them in whenever he caught anyone for speeding.

He left my office about 9 o'clock a. m. that morning, Monday, April 2, 1928, after swearing to such affidavit. He was in a fine humor, and seemed to be gratified that he was correcting a false press report, and stopping an injustice. I have no personal interest in this matter whatever.

(Signed) ELTON J. LAYTON.

Sworn to and subscribed before me on this, the 4th day of April, 1928, by the said Elton J. Layton, in the House Office Building. Given under my hand and seal of office in Washington, D. C.

[SEAL.] NORMAN E. IVES,
Notary Public in and for the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I now ask the Clerk to read in my time a statement from the inspector of traffic of the Metropolitan police department, which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TRAFFIC BUREAU, METROPOLITAN POLICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., April 2, 1928.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Private D. E. Galimore about 9.30 a. m., reported to me that he had had a conversation that morning with Congressman BLANTON.

There was no complaint whatever filed in this bureau against Congressman BLANTON, nor was he charged with speeding.

That date about noon, I casually mentioned the matter to Superintendent Hesse.

E. W. BROWN,
Inspector, Traffic Bureau.

Mr. BLANTON. I now ask the Clerk to read in my time the following affidavit, which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA:

I, Mrs. Louise K. Benton, being duly sworn, upon oath, state: I am Congressman BLANTON'S secretary, and have charge of his office. On Saturday, March 31, 1928, between 12 noon and 1 o'clock, a motor-cycle policeman, giving his name as Dalton E. Galimore, came to our office and asked to see Congressman BLANTON, and said he must see him at once, and he was greatly excited. I told him where I thought he could find him, and he said, "No; he is not there." He wanted to know the home address.

He started down the steps, and came back, and said that he had met Congressman BLANTON that morning and that they had stopped to have a friendly chat; and that it had been reported at headquarters and all over town that he had stopped Congressman BLANTON for speeding. He said that as he passed Congressman BLANTON'S car coming down to work he said, "Good morning," and that they had had a friendly chat; and because of this he had been accused of stopping him for speeding. He said that as soon as he heard about it he went to No. 6 precinct, where he thought Congressman BLANTON was conducting the Staples hearing, but it had adjourned; that press reporters with cameras told him that he was the cop who had arrested BLANTON for speeding and they wanted his picture; that they even accused him of having shot at Blanton; that he told said reporters such reports were not true, that he had not stopped BLANTON for speeding, as he was not speeding, and that he would break their cameras if they worried him.

He stated that he wanted to see Congressman BLANTON as soon as possible to tell him that he was not responsible for these reports. About this time the House had adjourned shortly after its convening on account of Senator WILLIS'S death. This policeman wanted to leave a written statement for Congressman BLANTON, but I told him that he would be at the office in a few minutes, for the adjournment bell had rung. And in a few minutes Congressman BLANTON stepped off the elevator. This policeman met him excitedly, and began explaining rapidly, and they walked off together. His whole intent and purpose seemed to be a desire to correct a false report indicating that he had stopped Congressman BLANTON for speeding, when he had not been speeding, and when he had not stopped him.

LOUISE K. BENTON.

Sworn to and subscribed by the said Mrs. Louise K. Benton before me, the undersigned authority, on this the 9th day of April, A. D. 1928. Given under my hand and seal of office in Washington, D. C.

[SEAL.] ELTON J. LAYTON,
Notary Public in and for the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk read the following affidavit in my time.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is this affidavit that is coming now?

Mr. BLANTON. Is the distinguished gentleman from New York getting uneasy when I am trying to show the question of personal privilege?

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman from New York does not think it necessary to spend the entire afternoon reading these papers, and he is not going to permit it if he can help it.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman does not think it is important when the press charges a Member of Congress with having violated the law when he did not violate the law?

Mr. SNELL. I asked what the affidavit was.

Mr. BLANTON. It is an affidavit showing the falsity of this statement.

Mr. SNELL. How many more of these affidavits has the gentleman?

Mr. BLANTON. I have several. I expect to take my full hour which the rules allow me.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA:

I, Winbern Howard Adcock, being sworn, upon oath, state: I am employed by Congressman BLANTON in his office. On last Saturday, during lunch hour, a policeman, dressed in traffic uniform, came to Congressman BLANTON'S office and seemed very anxious to find him, stating that he had been to No. 6 station looking for him, but that Congressman BLANTON already had left the Staples hearing. He had a conversation with Congressman BLANTON'S secretary, Mrs. Louise K. Benton, only part of which I overheard. I heard this traffic policeman tell Mrs. Benton that he had met Congressman BLANTON that morning in a friendly chat, and that some people were now making false statements about it, and that even some were claiming that he had shot at Congressman BLANTON. After talking to her some little time, I heard him tell Mrs. Benton that he wanted to give her a statement in writing, and she went to get paper for him, and about that time Congressman BLANTON came, but as he had to leave immediately for the Staples hearing this policeman went off with him. It was my impression that this policeman was trying to correct some false statement that had just appeared in the noon newspapers.

I reached Congressman BLANTON'S office last Monday morning at 20 minutes to 9 o'clock, and found this policeman seated in the chair and at the desk used by Mr. BLANTON, and he was leaning over toward the desk and seemed to be reading something. At this time he was in citizen's clothes, but I recognized him to be the same traffic policeman mentioned above. Congressman BLANTON was standing up at the desk by him. I hung my hat and coat up, got my work, and went out to the work office on another floor. I heard no conversation between them, as neither said anything while I was there.

WINBERN HOWARD ADCOCK.

Sworn to and subscribed by the said Winbern Howard Adcock before me on this the 3d day of April, A. D. 1928. Given under my hand and seal of office in Washington, D. C.

[SEAL.] HOWARD F. BRESEE,

Notary Public in and for the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this particular Saturday morning at 8.30 o'clock I was in my car on my way to my office to work. I live on Irving Street. I was going by the most direct route to my office. I turned out of Irving Street into Sherman Avenue, which is an arterial highway from north Washington and Maryland to the city, and I started down Sherman Avenue. I had to stop and wait probably half a minute to get into Sherman Avenue because of the stream of cars coming down town. At 8.30 o'clock in the morning you will find a constant stream of cars coming down Sherman Avenue to the city. I turned in behind at least 30 automobiles within sight, perhaps more, in front of me, in my place in the procession. There were at least 30 automobiles behind me in sight when I turned in there. As I was coming down Sherman Avenue a motor-cycle policeman cruised up by my side on my left, going down town, and was about to pass me, when he saw me and recognized me and said, "Good morning, Congressman." He was a man whom I have known for some time, and he is one of the best traffic policemen that I know of in the city of Washington. Anybody who knows him will tell you that he is one of the best we have. I have found him honest, truthful, and reliable. When I recognized him I happened to remember that he was the man who had had some charges preferred against him once that were a frame-up, by parties whom he has been trying to arrest.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not see how the gentleman is hurt very much by this. Colonel Herbert, our superintendent of prohibition in Baltimore, the other day admitted that he was traveling at 30 miles an hour through the city, and another man was arrested. The judge told him that if he had been before him he would have fined him for speeding through the city.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; but that is not similar to my being framed with false reports in the press.

Mr. LINTHICUM. This comes from notoriety.

Mr. BLANTON. There is something behind this that I want the House to know. It is something more serious than a newspaper report. It is something of vital importance to the Members of Congress that I want to tell you.

When I recognized this man I knew that he knew some facts that I wanted to know, and I asked him if he would turn off the street there to the curb opposite Garfield Hospital, as I wanted to speak to him. He did. It took up at least half a minute or a minute to turn out of the line to the curb. We stopped for a friendly chat. I asked him at least a dozen questions. People coming by might have supposed I had been arrested by seeing a "cop" talking with me. But it was not he who stopped me. It was I who stopped him, and he has so sworn, and he has so told my secretary. And we were on Sherman Avenue. And I was never on New Hampshire Avenue that day, as falsely stated by the newspapers.

Mr. SCHAFER. How fast were you going?

Mr. BLANTON. About 18 or 20 miles an hour, with about 30 cars in front and about 30 cars behind me. At no time, I tell you, did I turn around a car. That is the truth. When I got through talking with Galimore he pulled off on his motor cycle and I came on down Sherman Avenue to Florida Avenue, thence into New Jersey Avenue to my office. That is all there was to it.

I met the newspaper reporters that morning, four of them all together, and they asked me, long before this was ever printed by the press, "Mr. BLANTON, what is this report about you being arrested?" I told them there was not a word of truth in it, and I told them that if they would see the man I had talked with he would tell them so, too. Galimore tells you in his affidavit that he merely casually mentioned the matter at the Traffic Bureau to Inspector Brown, that he had had a talk with me that morning.

He tells you that when the report got out that he had stopped me for speeding he told the press reporters that it was a lie. He knew that I was conducting the Staples hearing, and he immediately went to No. 6 precinct, where that hearing was going on, to see me and explain that he was not responsible for the report. He tells you that camera men went there and tried to take his picture, and he told them the report was false, and he told them that if they did not quit bothering him he would break their cameras.

Yet, knowing all that, this paper and every other paper in Washington, except the News, published that false statement about it, and they continued to publish it.

And there has been a strenuous effort on the part of the police department to make this good motor-cycle man swear to a lie and say he did stop me. They threatened to put him off the force if he did not swear to it. Before I had seen him that day, when he heard of this report, my secretary and one of my clerks, Mr. Adcock, have sworn that he came to my office excitedly and wanted to see me, and made the statement that this false report was being gotten up here in Washington and he wanted to correct it before I saw it. It was an impulse of an honest man to prevent an injustice being done, and he did not want that false statement to be circulated, involving him, and have me think he had done me a wrong.

Mr. SCHAFER. All these great newspapers would not print those box-car headlines without some information. Does the gentleman know who gave them the information?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. I will go into that. It came from Major Hesse's office. I want to say this about the gentleman from Wisconsin. He and I have differences over the liquor question. He is a strong liquor man and I am a prohibitionist.

Mr. SCHAFER. No; I am a 2¾ per cent beer man.

Mr. BLANTON. He is a strong 2¾ per cent liquor man, and I am a prohibitionist, as the Constitution and the Volstead Act prescribe. There is a difference, but I want to say this: JOHN SCHAFER is honest; JOHN SCHAFER'S impulses are good. The impulses of his heart are good. There is not a man in this House—not one—who did more to help me in my Fenning investigation and to help me in bringing Fenning to justice than JOHN SCHAFER, and I am going to feel grateful to him as long as I live for the splendid help he gave me in that case; and in spite of his getting mad at me because we differ on the liquor question, I am JOHN SCHAFER'S friend, and if JOHN SCHAFER knew the facts that I know in this case he would be the first to rise up and try to see that there was a remedy provided, because JOHN SCHAFER is honest.

I say there was a deliberate attempt on the part of the headquarters office of the police force to break me down, because they knew I had been trying to check up that department and to eliminate from it lots of rottenness. It was a deliberate attempt, gentlemen, on the part of Major Hesse and his department, to break me down, if possible, and to stop my work in Washington and keep me from investigating him and his corrupt police officials.

I had charged Major Hesse, the head of that department—not only charged him but had produced witness after witness before the District Committee, the Gibson committee, of which I am a member, showing improper conduct on the part of the superintendent of police of this city, Major Hesse, and some of his police captains. It was because I had shown improper conduct on the part of high officials of the police department that they made this deliberate attempt to break me down. But they will not succeed. And they can not break me down.

Now, I want to say this: I was then conducting an important hearing, which has not been finished yet. It is now before the commissioners. I shall not go into its details on this floor at this time until it is finished, but then I expect to go into it fully if they still do injustice to this man; but I want to say to you colleagues of mine, 434 of you, that if you men could only know what is in the record of that case which I was conducting from two standpoints, first, as a Member of Congress on your District Committee, to find out what is going on in the District of Columbia, and, secondly, because a poor young policeman, who was a service man, who served your United States Navy and your flag for three years, appealed to me and said that he was not able to employ an attorney and he asked me to see that he had a fair trial.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. The gentleman from Texas is discussing a trial, which is not before this body, and I am constrained to object. This matter has been before the trial board and the man was found guilty by the trial board. He has a right to appeal to the District Commissioners, and he has a right to appeal from the District Commissioners to the courts of the land, and I do not think it is proper, under this question of personal privilege, to discuss the Staples trial. I believe the gentleman from Texas should be confined to a discussion of the question of speeding under his right of personal privilege, and I hope he will not press the discussion of the Staples trial at this time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I have the right to show the motive and intent of the persons who caused that false report to go into the press of the country. My hands are not tied. Why, under privilege a person has always been permitted to go into a full explanation and show the motives and intent of the parties who have made or circulated improper and false statements about them, and that is what I am trying to do. I know the rules and I am going to keep within them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman has strayed from the subject of privilege. The Chair thinks the gentleman has the right to show the motives that might have actuated persons in making this accusation, but he does not think the gentleman should discuss a police trial.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not. I said I would refrain from doing that now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes the gentleman will confine himself to the matter of privilege.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall. I know the rules because I have been studying them for 11 years. Of course, I do not know them as well as BERT SNELL, the gentleman from New York, but I know them.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say this: That this persecution has been brought about solely because of my activity on the District Committee, in cleaning up rotten conditions in Washington. I wish I were not a member of that committee. I have served my time on it and I have done the hardest work I ever did in my life since I have been on that committee.

I wish you gentlemen would relieve me of the responsibility that is attached to it. As a member of the District Committee, my duty is to look into District affairs and see that this Nation's Capital, which is in the control of Congress, is properly conducted, in order that there shall be no rottenness in its departments, and if I found rottenness, such as existed in the Fenning case, it was my sworn duty to bring it to the attention of this Congress through the committee of which I was a member. If you will take our leader on the Ways and Means Committee, our friend, JACK GARNER, he will tell you that he put me on that committee without my asking for it. I have never asked for it, but he put me there, expecting me to do the work that came as a part of the responsibilities resting on a member of that committee. I am the acting ranking Democratic member on that committee, so that the work has been upon me. When a measure is brought here from the District Committee you gentlemen look to me as one member to tell you what is in that measure, and to advise you whether or not it ought to be passed or whether it ought to be killed. I have tried to do my duty in that respect and this is a punishment; this is an attempted reprisal on the part of the heads of the police department and of the newspapers here, whose purposes and ambitions are to get back the 50–50 plan or at least the 60–40 plan, against which I have been fighting for years, and I have helped to keep the taxes here of Washington people up at a normal rate, so that our constituents at home would not have to pay their civic expenses.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. The newspapers in the District have been exceedingly fair to the gentleman from Texas. He has had the headlines practically every day, and generally they have been pretty fair.

Mr. BLANTON. If my friend thinks it is headlines I am after, he is mistaken. Every newspaper will tell you that they have repeatedly for three years, and Mr. GIBSON, our chairman, is here, and he will tell you that they have repeatedly tried to take picture after picture of my committee, and I have been the one who has kept them from doing it.

If you consult the press you will see that the picture of our Gibson committee each time was taken after the committee had adjourned and I had left. I have refused to let them take any pictures. I have tried to keep out of the press. I have tried to do my duty as a man should under his oath and keep out of the press, but this is a direct attempted punishment and an attempted reprisal on me for having been active against some of the leaders here in Washington who were engaged in rotten practices at the expense of the people.

For instance, let me call your attention to one matter to show the animus and the purpose and the motive of the superintendent of police. It so happened here that a short time ago before the Gibson committee we put three different citizens on the stand and they testified that the major and superintendent of police had been drinking and had been drunk.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Did not the chief of police testify he had been using a mouth wash with an alcoholic content?

Mr. BLANTON. That was an excuse he gave the commissioners, one of whom passed it on to me, and he claimed to me that it was medicine.

Mr. SCHAFER. Were these policemen expert witnesses—chemists and so forth—that they could testify absolutely to the facts in the case?

Mr. BLANTON. Well, I will tell my friend from Wisconsin some facts about it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Wait a minute. I want to answer the gentleman from Wisconsin first.

I will state to my friend I had your superintendent of police brought before the committee and I told him I wanted him to hear what I had to say to him. I told him about the number of times, at least six, during the last year when I had seen him in his office intoxicated to a certain extent, and about the talk I had had with him about a year ago to the effect that if he did not quit it and did not stay sober and did not prevent a wrong morale among his men, I was going to report him, and then when I got through I said, "Now, Mr. Chief of Police, I submit myself to you. If you want to ask me any questions, I will answer any questions you want to ask." He said, "No questions at all"; not a one, although I had charged him with this misconduct. And when I sought to question him, he claimed his privilege, and refused to answer.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I submit a point of order——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. An attack upon the superintendent of police in the District of Columbia can have nothing to do with the matter the gentleman is discussing on the question of personal privilege.

Mr. BLANTON. He is the man whose office gave out the false report.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I submit to the Chair the gentleman is going too far.

Mr. BLANTON. I am showing his motive and intent. I have traced it to him. If the gentleman will read Inspector Brown's statement——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I want to be heard on my point of order. The gentleman is going into another hearing and into another question, not having anything to do with the question of personal privilege.

Mr. BLANTON. O Mr. Speaker, let me call your attention to this press report emanating from this police department.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would think that if the gentleman from Texas is undertaking to supply some connecting link between the chief of police or others in giving out or circulating the report that the gentleman from Texas compelled a policeman to sign a false statement, the gentleman is entitled to do that.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. But the gentleman has furnished no connecting link.

Mr. BLANTON. I will furnish it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is assuming the gentleman intends to furnish it.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I intend to do it. If the gentleman from Illinois will notice, Inspector Brown, of the traffic department, states in this statement which he gives me, that he mentioned to the chief of police, Major Hesse, that Galimore had stopped me and had had a talk with me one morning. I have traced it to police headquarters, to the office of the superintendent himself, from which emanated this false report.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry I can not yield. If the gentleman is going to obstruct me, I can not yield.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It is not a question of obstruction. I submit on the point of order that what the gentleman pretends connects the chief of police of the District of Columbia with his situation with respect to the question of personal privilege does not so connect.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, in that connection——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas assert there is a direct connection?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; a direct connection.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman should state it.

Mr. BLANTON. This report came from the superintendent's office to the press reporters. It was absolutely from his office, and they have repeated time and time again that they got it from headquarters. I want to be fair——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. So do I.

Mr. BLANTON. I can not yield now. The Chair has overruled the gentleman, and I can not yield now. I am sorry.

I am surprised at my friend the gentleman from Illinois trying to obstruct a proposition of this kind. Even my friend the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] is so honest that he is not trying to obstruct it.

He knows this is an important matter, and my friend the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON], the stalwart chairman of the Gibson committee, which Congress authorized to investigate conditions here and with whom I have worked shoulder to shoulder, will tell you the reason the police department here is after me, and he will tell you that I developed before his committee through the sworn testimony of three of the best police officers of the District, Mr. Helmuth and Inspector Headley and another policeman who testified under oath, that they had been obstructed in the administration of law by their captain, Bremmerman; that the foreman of the grand jury, Mr. Martin D. McQuade, had kept Helmuth and another policeman from serving warrants upon his friends who were running gambling houses, and when McQuade came out with his grand jury report and tried to throw discredit on Policeman Helmuth, you will remember reading in the press that the distinguished gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HAMMER] all came out and said that they believed Helmuth told the truth, in spite of the discredit that the grand jury foreman tried to throw upon him.

This is what is involved in this case. We have been trying to clean up one of your departments here in your behalf and in behalf of the 110,000,000 constituents we have at home who own this Capital.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SCHAFER. Was the grand jury report on the Helmuth case in the possession of the Gibson committee so that they had full opportunity to consider the complete report prior to the statements appearing in the press, which the gentleman has mentioned as being made by the committee?

Mr. BLANTON. The grand jury report is in Mr. GIBSON's office now, unless he has sent it away.

Mr. SCHAFER. Was that full and complete report of the grand jury in the possession of the Gibson committee in sufficient time before the statements were made to the press?

Mr. BLANTON. I will yield to Judge GIBSON and ask him if it is not a fact that members of the committee felt that the grand jury foreman told a lie?

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I would not like to designate it by the term used by the gentleman from Texas. But two or three members of that committee were confident that the policemen had told the truth. I think that should be said in all fairness. In answer to the gentleman from Wisconsin let me say that at the time Judge GILBERT made his statement we had just received the grand jury report but had not then considered it. We have not yet fully considered the report, because it is in the hands of an agency of the United States Government to be checked up. It is being analyzed, and we expect the report from competent authority with relation to it.

Mr. BLANTON. I thank my friend from Vermont. But they did find that Helmuth told the truth.

Now, every newspaper in Washington stated that afternoon that the grand jury foreman had made an attack on me, because I had brought the police testimony out against him, and Chief Justice McCoy told me that there was not a single word in the grand jury report that in any way reflected on me in any manner whatever.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take up any further time. I want to say this to the Congress: I am busy about general legislation just like you are. I attend to all District investigations when Congress is not in session. All during that trial I was working 16 and 18 hours a day in trying to protect the integrity of a congressional committee, and I also did my work on the floor of the House like you did. I attended the sessions like you did when there was anything of importance. On every important matter you will find my vote. I was doing my duty. But I want to say this to you, that because they could not get the young man, the motor-cycle policeman to swear to a lie—because they could not do that the police department of this District has preferred charges against him and they are to try him on next Thursday. I have not the time to defend him, and see that he gets a square deal. I must do my duty here as a Representative of the people. For three months I have had five employees working for me every day and three of them I have paid out of my own pocket. I am that busy that I can not go to defend that poor boy, and the chances are that they will frame him up and discharge him from the police force because they can not get him to tell a lie about me. Are you going to stand for it? Are you going to let the police department do that injustice to him? Every word in his affidavit is the truth. They tried to make him swear to a lie against me, but they could not make him do it. But they will ruin him, if you permit it.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield? This boy has a right to appeal to the District of Columbia Commissioners and appeal to the courts. The gentleman does not think the court of last appeal would be a party to that "frame-up," does he?

Mr. BLANTON. He can not appeal to the courts. Let me show you how the District Commissioners feel about the trial board. Here is the Washington Times which said, "High police officials and District officials are elated by the verdict." They rejoice that Staples had been convicted by their own trial board. What do you expect of the District Commissioners on an appeal to them when they are elated because a man has been convicted on manufactured false testimony, when they have not heard a scintilla of the evidence?

Now, as I say, I can not be there at this trial; but I want to say that it would be an infamous, damnable injustice for them to frame that poor boy because they can not make him tell a lie about me. Are you going to permit it? We must change that trial board. It is infamous to let them sit there and try members of the police for high crimes and misdemeanors without any law, rules, or regulations to preserve order, to let in what they want in, and keep out what they do not want to let in. The police officials leave it to their own police board, under their own orders, whether they want a man kept in or kept out, and they render any kind of a verdict they want to, and the board is not under oath.

I want to say to my friend SCHAFER, who is honest and hates every kind of rottenness, that if he knew what I know about these trials he would go down and do what I did—he would do some extra work for his country and defend that poor boy when they try to frame him up next Thursday. You would stand up and tell them that they could not discharge him because he would not swear to a lie for them.

Mr. SCHAFER. I do not agree with the gentleman, because I do not think a Member of Congress is supposed to go down before a trial board and act as a friend of the court or as counsel for the defendant and endeavor to intimidate the trial board, because that is a violation of the law.

Mr. BLANTON. That did not happen. I tell my friend this. He is an ex-service man himself, and I wish that I could have been one of his buddies. I was serving my country in Congress when the war was on. I wish I had gone across with the gentleman. Suppose one of the gentleman's buddies, with no money, with a wife and three children, were to come to you and say, "JOHN, I am framed on false testimony, on manufactured testimony, false as it can be, and I have not the money to employ counsel. Won't you look after me and defend me as my counsel?" Would the gentleman turn him down?

Mr. SCHAFER. I would. I would not go down to the trial board, because I think it is not right for a Congressman to do so. There is a statute against trying to intimidate the courts and public officers when determining questions of that kind. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. About 15 Republicans on the Republican side have applauded the gentleman, but the other Republicans and all these Democrats on my side have not applauded him, and all these Republicans here except 15 have not applauded him.

Mr. SCHAFER rose.

Mr. BLANTON. I have yielded to the gentleman every time he wanted me to do it, and I yield now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas must confine himself to the question of personal privilege.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I have tried to be courteous and fair to my friend from Wisconsin, even though he has tried to hamstring me and hit me below the belt.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Texas is going too far. I shall ask that those words be stricken out.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, my time is not out.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas has strained the rule pretty far, and the Chair will insist that from now on he confine himself solely to the question of privilege.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman better withdraw that statement, or I will have a question of personal privilege myself. I never strike anyone below the belt.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, I will say to the gentleman that he hit me above the belt then, or he hit at me. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say this. These false reports of the newspapers can not hurt me down in Texas where I live, because people there know me, but they can hurt me in the other 47 States, when strangers read these headlines. That is the reason I have taken this hour's time of yours and mine and of the people to correct these false statements. I think the papers owe it to me to come out and make a retraction, and I am going to expect them to do it, if they are fair and honest. If William Randolph Hearst's papers were fair and honest when they set my name on the front page in five different editions in box-car letters, then he or his editors will make a proper retraction, because I have proven conclusively that there was nothing in their report of an alleged arrest, that there was no arrest. I was not even stopped, and there was nothing to the statement. The reports were false. If they are honest, they will correct the statement, and the press everywhere will likewise do so. I thank you. [Applause.]

FLOOD CONTROL

The SPEAKER. Under the special order of the House, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] for 30 minutes.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to bear testimony to the energy, the courage, the ability, and the sincerity of Chairman FRANK REID and the other members of the House Committee on Flood Control for rendering a very high order of service to the Congress and to the country. Without the exhaustive hearings and careful investigations, and especially without the bold and convincing declaration by the House Flood Control Committee that flood prevention, under the Constitution, in the Mississippi Valley is a national responsibility, the bill before the House would never have been produced in the Senate. FRANK REID and his committee are responsible for the provisions in the Jones bill providing national flood control without local contributions and wise control over the construction of spillways and outlets. [Applause.]

When this disaster occurred, shocking the Nation as it did, Chairman FRANK REID and other members of his committee visited the scenes of the tragedy. They beheld the flood in all its horror. I met him in Chicago at the great flood conference working zealously to bring the Congress the truth of this situation.

On November 7 he called his committee and began a series of the most exhaustive hearings upon every phase of this problem. Before his committee more than 300 witnesses appeared, including able engineers and citizens connected with industry, agriculture, and commerce, 98 per cent of whom declared flood prevention not a local responsibility. The evidence showed that the Congress must deal with a problem involving the lives of millions of American citizens and the preservation of billions of the Nation's wealth.

For their heroic services to our common country in their successful fight for complete Federal control, without local contributions, and for proper recognition of the tributaries, the names of FRANK REID in the House and HARRY HAWES in the Senate will live forever in the minds of a grateful people in the lower valley. [Applause.]

A GLIMPSE OF THE TRAGEDY

In the spring of 1927 the valley was stricken down with a disaster of such magnitude that President Coolidge said:

> We propose to solve the problem of flood control so that such a situation may never again have to be met. In the solution we shall advance our system of inland waterways.

General Jadwin described this tragedy as only less serious than war itself; Secretary Hoover, as America's greatest peacetime disaster, a national problem. These three, therefore, are in honor committed to national responsibility at Federal expense. Seven hundred thousand people were driven from their homes. Two hundred and fifty million dollars' worth of property was actually destroyed. A billion dollars in business was lost to the country. Interruption of the normal lives of the citizens, paralysis of commerce and the United States mails extending over a period of three or four months was the result. Had it not been for the Red Cross, temporary Federal and local agencies, and the generosity of the American people thousands of children, men, and women would have starved or perished with disease.

Hundreds of thousands of our citizens lived upon the bounty of the Red Cross alone. A recent report of this organization makes public the fact that about 71,000 of these citizens are still the recipients of that bounty. All these agencies offered merely temporary assistance. None of them could offer permanent relief. These generous and noble forces have practically exhausted their resources, and the horror of a future tragedy still hangs over the people of the valley.

RUIN AND DEVASTATION

I had the opportunity of visiting Belgium and France after the World War. Like all American citizens interested in the humane activities of this Government, I supported every measure for the relief of the stricken regions of these countries, for which this Government, without local contributions, has expended billions, but never did cannon or Zeppelin inflict upon a people greater or more complete ruin and devastation than did the waters of the Mississippi upon the people whom I have the honor in part to represent. Can we do less for our own people? [Applause.]

AMERICAN CONSCIENCE AROUSED

I state the facts briefly, because the history of the flood, its scenes of devastation, and its pitiful tale of misery have been graphically told by the great news agencies of America. There was a unanimous demand through the United States last summer that here in the richest country on earth, with a $600,000,000 surplus in its Treasury, no such disaster should ever be permitted to occur again, as tersely stated by President Coolidge on October 4. I attended in many places great gatherings of the citizens of the valley, assembled under their constitutional rights to petition the Government for a redress of their wrongs. Practically every public official who cared to speak at all, including President Coolidge, General Jadwin, and Secretary Hoover, aligned himself on the side of those who declared this problem of the control of the flood waters of the Mississippi and its tributaries to be a national obligation. [Applause.]

FEDERAL CONTROL IS ECONOMY

The Constitution specifically authorizes the Congress to act, in emergencies, for national defense, to preserve the Nation's commerce, and to protect life and property. The Congress is now acting under that authority. Permanent flood control would be economical at any cost to the Government. The daily press, the magazines, the testimony before the committees, and the patriotic people in all sections of the country present overwhelming and conclusive evidence that national sentiment demands that the floods of the Mississippi Valley be controlled without local contributions. For more than three-quarters of a century, because of expanding farms and denuded lands, the danger of increasing floods in the valley has been recognized as imminent.

Washington, Jefferson, and Jackson warned against the danger and urged Federal control of this mighty river; but it required the national calamity of 1927 to give us a new perspective and to convince the whole country of the necessity of a permanent national flood-control program, the solemn duty of the Government promptly to establish and put into operation. This new vision of the facts and this new expressed determination of the American people have given to the Congress the light of a new day and the opportunity to act now as becomes a great Nation like this in putting our rivers to work and converting our flood waters from masters into servants. [Applause.] The river belongs to the United States; the Government asserts control of it over any State or community and is therefore responsible for the cost of controlling its waters. The Mississippi River is the common highway of the Nation, and this fact is recognized by all the people of all the States. The patriotic people in and out of the valley demand that the National Government pay the entire cost of protective works, because in so doing all the States within the flooded area and remote from the river will pay their just portion of the cost. The valley people have paid not only their part of the taxes used by the Federal Government but by local contributions $295,000,000 additional for levees. This is a common task for a common purpose and should be paid for out of the common Treasury. [Applause.] The splendid response of the Senate to this national demand and the promised action by the House within the near future have given the people of the lower valley a new lease on life. Arising from the sufferings of the recent tragedy, they face the future with a new hope and courage.

DISASTER REPEATED IN LOUISIANA

I speak from personal experience. I live in a section of the valley which felt more keenly than any other the paralyzing effect of the flood. It happens that I represent thousands of the citizens who tremble still with the menace of impending disaster to their lives and their homes. These people represent a citizenship as old or older than the American Republic itself. This, therefore, can not be considered a reclamation project.

The flood of 1927 which so appalled the world was not the first, even in my own time, which has consigned our people and their resources to charity and public dependency.

I came to the Congress in 1913. In that very year a flood of great proportions laid waste a large section of this country. In 1922 it all but annihilated us, and in 1927 this river completed the job.

LESS THAN 1 PER CENT

It is not the waters of the immediate States which are responsible for floods; it is the waters that come from States at a distance. The greatest sufferer of all the States is Louisiana, 8,707 square miles of whose alluvial lands were inundated in 1927. Practically all the rainfall in this State is carried to the Gulf through its bayous, creeks, and smaller rivers. The waters of this State do not enter the Mississippi nor contribute to the floods which overmaster the ingenuity of the people of Louisiana. Less than 1 per cent of the water originating within the State flows into the Mississippi River. To be exact, during major flood periods the only area in the State that actually drains into the Mississippi River is the territory between the Mississippi-Louisiana State line and Baton Rouge on the east bank of the river, or approximately 110 square miles. Yet the total area drained into the Mississippi River pouring down upon Louisiana is 1,196,600 square miles.

LOUISIANA SUFFERS UNFAIRLY

Louisiana is consequently more vitally interested in national flood control than any other State, for if she had only to take care of the water from her own watershed it would not be necessary to build levees or any other protective works.

But in an endeavor to protect the alluvial valley of Louisiana from inundation there has been built 1,546.4 miles of levees, of which 827.5 miles are on the Mississippi River and 718.8 miles on the tributaries and the Atchafalaya outlet.

The total cost of the levees in Louisiana alone to date has been $143,647,243, of which $35,053,396.27 was paid for by the United States and $108,593,846.73 by the State and local interests.

We have been compelled to use local contributions from the Louisiana taxpayers in the sum of $5,765,258.31 to construct levees in the State of Arkansas to protect Louisiana life and property.

PROOF OF NATIONAL PROBLEM

These facts concerning Louisiana should be convincing that flood control, under the Constitution, is truly a national problem. Not by the forces of nature alone, but in the progress of civilization Louisiana has been rendered prostrate largely by the hands of man. Every tree cut away, every farm improved, every foot of tile drainage, every road constructed and properly drained increases the flow of water to the sea and pours the floods with ever-increasing and relentless fury upon the people of my State. This is a condition for which Louisiana is not responsible.

If I injure your land, I have no right to expect you to help me pay the damage. Under the law I am held responsible. When the 31 States above us in the basin embracing an area of more than a million square miles and containing 41 per cent of the population of the United States, send their flood waters upon Louisiana, destroying life and property, they have no right to demand local contributions from us to pay the damages done by them to us. The problem of flood control is clearly national, not local. It is the Nation's job. [Applause.]

COMPLETE FEDERAL CONTROL

Two things are certain—the floods must be stopped and the river and its tributaries must be kept navigable. The Congress must see to it that sufficient funds are provided and that engineers of proper caliber are put in charge.

Controlling the floods of the Mississippi is the greatest problem ever presented to the engineering profession of the country, the Panama Canal not excepted. American engineers successfully completed the great waterway across Panama after others had failed. They can overcome the sullen waters of the Mississippi and control them as accurately as you drain your front yard. Nothing should be permitted to delay the Government's obtaining the best engineering skill and ample funds with which to do the job.

SINGLE AUTHORITY

The success or failure of the flood program will hinge upon whether the Congress places the responsibility and the authority in a single head. Control and responsibility must not be divided.

For example: On February 18, this year, I took up with the Chief of Engineers an urgent request for the closing of the Vick and Ben Ruth Lake crevasses in Avoyelles Parish in my district. Six days later he presented the case to the president of the Mississippi River Commission. On March 12, 23 days later, I received a decision from the Chief of Engineers stating that it was so late that the work could not be completed until July, when the high-water period would have been passed. The Lord has protected these people behind these broken levees by not sending the floods this year, for divided authority has made it impossible to get action by the Government. The fault lies not in the Chief of Engineers or in the Mississippi River Commission, but in the unwisdom of the Congress in creating divided authority.

It is not important whether the Mississippi River Commission, the Army engineers, or a new commission is given control, provided that the ablest engineers are selected and supreme authority is vested in a single head. No great undertaking can be successful without a supreme directing hand as was given Gorgas in the Panama Canal.

CONGRESS AND THE ENGINEERS

The plan of working out in detail and constructing the flood-control works is the most intricate and difficult engineering task ever undertaken by man, but the problem that the Congress faces is simple and direct. It is not the function of the engineers to decide how the cost shall be paid, nor is it the function of the Congress to meddle with the details of the engineering program. The Congress has the right and duty to furnish the money and demand definite results. The task requires the best engineering ability in the United States, unhampered by red tape or preconceived notions, and with ample power under a single authority to adopt and execute a definite plan of flood-control works. It is no time for discredited and fossilized methods or for piecemeal work. The whole flood problem must be considered as a unit and engineers must be employed big enough to visualize the whole job and to execute a program that will forever stop the ravages of the floods. [Applause.]

SUFFERING PEOPLE'S COURAGE

The lower Mississippi Valley is facing its second reconstruction period. A little more than half a century ago its man power stacked arms for the last time and turned courageously to the overwhelming task of rebuilding a section devastated by a bloody war. To-day the sons and grandsons of those same veterans are heroically facing a problem which rivals that of the sixties.

More than 20,000 square miles of the rich alluvial valley of the Mississippi and its tributaries were laid waste. Homes were swept away by an invading enemy more powerful and irresistible than any army which ever set foot on alien soil. Two million livestock were drowned or killed, farm implements were lost, newly planted seed were washed away, industry and commerce were paralyzed, and more than half a million people were driven from their homes. Over the entire area the scene was one of terrific destruction and ruin.

This flood put to the test again the traditional courage of the people. Heroism, such heroism as in normal times would have won the applause of a nation, went unnoticed. Great, broad-shouldered men from the back country, other men whose untanned faces showed they had left desks in offices to help in the emergency, women, literally hundreds of them, displayed courage and heroism, the memory of which will live forever. An appeal for justice now from a people who so valiantly and courageously faced the overwhelming vicissitudes of nature must not go unanswered. The richest Nation in all the world can not and will not fail to take control now and pay the cost.

HUMAN ELEMENT

While we talk about dollars let us not forget the value of a human life. As the great seas of muddy, turgid water swept over thousands of miles of territory, transforming happy homes into vast areas of waste, newspapers gave the country the encouraging message that the "loss of life was surprisingly small." But as a preventable loss of life it looms as a great tragedy. Two hundred and forty-six persons went to their death during that disaster. Two hundred and forty-six homes were broken up by the grim reaper riding on the crest of the flood. Two hundred and forty-six families, with little children left fatherless or motherless, will have to readjust their whole lives and face an uncertain and difficult future. A vote against adequate Federal preventive measures now is a death ballot for hundreds of others who must look to the lower valley for their living. [Applause.]

For half a century the people of the valley have lived and struggled with the ever-present threat of invasion hanging over their heads. Like a great enemy army assembled on its borders stands the mighty Mississippi. We have just witnessed one of these ruthless invasions. Picture if you can men, women, and children scurrying before the onslaught to a Red Cross refugee camp. They had to leave behind them all that was dear, the accumulations of a lifetime, and carry on their backs what little they could. They had to flee for their lives, leaving to the fury of the waters their homes and possessions. If you could have stood at Arkansas City, Vicksburg, or Alexandria, La., you would have seen these hapless people pour in by the thousands, half clad, hungry, some of them sick, and in dozens of cases mothers holding new-born babies, whose natal chambers had been the tops of muddy levees—little refugees born in the night without nurse or doctor while their mothers waited for rescue.

The ingenuity of man has not yet devised a way to control some of the furies of the elements. Earthquakes destroyed cities in California; a hurricane struck Florida and many lives were lost. Tornadoes swept through the Mid West and killed hundreds. A section of Ohio suffered a devastating windstorm. These things we can not prevent. But if we could and steadfastly refused, the blood of these unfortunate people would be on our hands. How, then, could we justify our refusal to act when we have it within our power now to put an abrupt stop to the ruthless loss of life, the staggering property damage, and the disrupting of all social, economic, and industrial activities in the Mississippi Valley.

CORRECT THE RECORD NOW

In a nation which built the Panama Canal, a nation which has to its credit some of the world's most glorious engineering accomplishments, and a nation which to-day leads the world in wealth and progress, the Mississippi deluge was a national disgrace. [Applause.] The American people are eager to see this Congress remove that stain from the record. The House has before it the Jones bill, whose provisions are fundamentally sound, the one weapon with which the Government may strike down forever this enemy of our civilization. We hope and believe that the House may rise equal to the emergency in this crisis and respond to the overwhelming expressed national sentiment as promptly and as nobly as did the Senate. [Great applause.]

JAMES EDWARD WOODLAND

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, on Friday night last at 11 o'clock a very distinguished citizen of my State, Mr. James Edward Woodland, of Morehead City, passed into the great unknown. For some years he has been the host of this House annually in furnishing us with the delicious oysters which we have had occasion to enjoy as his guests. He was one of the best friends that I ever had. Originally from Crisfield, Md., he came down to North Carolina. Not long since, after being in Washington, he was suddenly stricken with angina pectoris, and was taken to the hospital at Baltimore. Later he went home thinking he was well, but yesterday on the beautiful Easter day he was buried in his boyhood home, the place of his birth, surrounded by loving friends. I take this opportunity to pay a tribute to a real, American, a real friend, and I thank the Speaker and the House for granting me this opportunity. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill (H. R. 5817) to provide for the paving of the Government road extending from St. Elmo, Tenn., to Rossville, Ga.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3598. An act authorizing Dupo Bridge Co., a Missouri corporation, its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Carondelet, Mo.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Senate Resolution 191

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. ANDRIEUS A. JONES, late a Senator from the State of New Mexico.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay tribute to his high character and distinguished public service.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to his memory the Senate, at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS

The SPEAKER. This is District day.

REGULATING THE PRACTICE OF OSTEOPATHY

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 16) to regulate the practice of osteopathy in the District of Columbia, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland calls up the bill (H. R. 16) to regulate the practice of osteopathy in the District of Columbia, and asks unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is that request made only as to this one bill, or as to all bills?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. It is to this one bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, when we adjourned on the last District day, we had under consideration a bill for the policewoman's bureau, and the gentleman from Maryland then stated positively—and the RECORD will show it—that that bill would be the unfinished business for the next District day, which is to-day. I am hopeful that the gentleman from Maryland will keep faith with the committee, especially with the Members who asked him about it, and will now call that bill up for the policewoman's bureau as the unfinished business and let us dispose of it.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will say to the gentleman that my recollection is that I was asked if I would bring up the bill and I stated I would.

Mr. BLANTON. As the unfinished business.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I do not think I stated that in the RECORD.

Mr. BLANTON. Let us get the RECORD. It will show.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL], the ranking majority member of the committee, is out of the city. He had several amendments that he wished to propose to this bill. He asked the chairman of the committee to hold the bill over. The chairman did not feel that it was absolutely a matter of life and death to pass the bill on this day. I confess that if I stated I would bring it up as the unfinished business, I would feel constrained to do so.

Mr. BLANTON. I am glad that the gentleman wants to keep faith. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] has been against this bill for 10 years, or ever since he has been in Congress. He has fought this bill consistently, both in the committee and out of it, and if he were here now he would fight it. His statement made on the last District day showed that he was unalterably opposed to it. But the committee voted the bill out by almost unanimous consent, except his vote and one other.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I understand it was a unanimous report.

Mr. BLANTON. It was; but the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HAMMER] reserved the right to fight it on the floor. And so, it being a unanimous report almost and being indorsed by every single organization in this city—by the Parent-Teachers' Association, by the Daughters of the American Revolution, by the Federated Women's Clubs, by the various citizens' associations, by the Board of Trade, and the almost unanimous report of the committee—I want the gentleman to keep faith.

I will read from the RECORD exactly what the gentleman said before we adjourned the last time. I read:

Mr. BLANTON. It would be better to have it go over as unfinished business until next District day, and then we can finish it.

Mr. TILSON. It will go over as unfinished business, and it is for the committee to say what it will call up on the next District day.

Mr. BLANTON. We either ought to finish it this evening or have it go over as unfinished business to be taken up next District day.

Mr. TILSON. Let it go over as unfinished business.

Mr. BLANTON. And the chairman will bring it up as unfinished business on next District day?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Very well; just so long as it holds it place.

That is a distinct understanding that was had with the chairman. I ask him to keep faith with the committee.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will say to the gentleman that neither myself nor the author of the bill feel that it is absolutely necessary to bring this bill up. I have no request pending. I have no objection; but my understanding from the floor leader was that there was a large Private Calendar, and a number of Members wanted to speak on the policewoman's bureau bill, and that it would occupy some time.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman and the floor leader agreed that it would come up as unfinished business. I know the gentleman will keep faith.

Mr. SIMMONS. The understanding was that it should come up at the call of the District Committee.

Mr. BLANTON. I asked the chairman, and he agreed upon it. If it is unfinished business and was to hold its place, as agreed, it means it should be brought up now. I will help the gentleman push the other bills and pass them, but we ought first to finish this policewoman's bureau bill. It has been dragging along before the Congress for 10 years, and should be passed.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that there is a large Private Calendar and many Members are anxious to consider the bills. I assured the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] that he would have an opportunity to offer these amendments. I do not think the chairman would be fair to him and other Members of the Committee if he did otherwise. I assured the gentleman from Massachusetts, I repeat, that he would have an opportunity to offer amendments to correct certain sections of the bill which were amended in the committee. The gentleman from Massachusetts states that he was laboring either under a misapprehension or a misrepresentation.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman call up the policewoman's bureau bill next after this bill is disposed of?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I have just stated that the gentleman from Massachusetts, the ranking member, was out of the city and he should be given an opportunity to offer amendments.

Mr. BLANTON. I saw the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] here this morning after 10 o'clock. I know he has sickness in his family and I sympathize with him deeply. But we can offer his amendment for him and have it voted on.

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. BLANTON. I object, Mr. Speaker; I want the gentleman from Maryland to keep faith. It was a solemn agreement.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 16, a bill to regulate osteopaths in the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 16. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 16, with Mr. CHINDBLOM in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 16, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I have read the report on this bill. Has this bill been approved by the District Commissioners or any other authorities in the District of Columbia?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will say to the gentleman that the chairman did not draw the report and is not familiar with what indorsements of the bill were on file.

Mr. CRAMTON. The House is entitled to know from the report what the attitude of the District government is toward important legislation of this kind. If those reports are on file they should have been included in the report of the committee. If there are no such recommendations then I think we ought to have the bill read. So far as I have read the bill, it is a bill that impresses me as a very peculiar proposition. I will probably vote for it if it is recommended by the authorities of the District, but if it comes here representing the ideas of somebody who is pushing some pet hobby then that is a different matter.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will say to the gentleman that there are a number of these bills regulating the various branches of what is known as the healing art which have been very vigorously opposed by the Medical Society of the District of Columbia, and they have endeavored to consolidate all regulations in one bill in the Senate.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am not concerned about what the medical profession's attitude is. I would like to know the attitude of the responsible heads of the District government. The gentleman's committee, I assume, submits these measures to the commissioners for report?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes. I will say to the gentleman that I did not draw the report.

Mr. CRAMTON. But the gentleman is calling up the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will object for the present. That will give the chairman a chance to look up any reports which may have been made by the District authorities.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be, and is hereby, created a board of osteopathic examiners for the District of Columbia, which shall consist of five members, to be selected by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia from a list of 10 practitioners of osteopathy in the District of Columbia, said list to be furnished by the Osteopathic Association of the District of Columbia, and shall include only such practitioners who are qualified as hereinafter provided. Such list shall be transmitted annually to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia under the seal of said association and shall be signed by the president and secretary thereof, and the commissioners shall make all future appointments to the board of osteopathic examiners from the list last submitted. In case of failure of said association to submit said list the commissioners shall appoint members in good standing of said association without restriction: Provided, however, That said members shall be qualified by graduation and practice as hereinafter required. Within 30 days after the commissioners shall have notified the several members of their appointment each member shall forward to said commissioners the following oath: "I do swear that I will faithfully perform the duties of a member of the board of osteopathic examiners for the District of Columbia to the best of my ability. So help me, God." After which the commissioners shall issue to each of the examiners a certificate of appointment.

SEC. 2. That the members of said board first appointed, as hereinbefore provided, shall be practitioners of osteopathy, of good moral character, and graduates of colleges or schools of osteopathy; said colleges to have requirements equal to those recognized by the American Osteopathic Association, and that thereafter no person shall be eligible for such appointment unless, in addition to the qualifications hereinbefore prescribed, he has first obtained a license to practice osteopathy in the District of Columbia under the provisions of this act: Provided, That no member of said board shall hold said position while in any manner financially interested in any osteopathic school or college, or connected with the faculty or management of such school or college.

SEC. 3. That the term of office of the members of said board of osteopathic examiners of the District of Columbia shall be for a term of three years: Provided, That of the first members of the board two shall be appointed for one year, two for two years, and one for three years. Any vacancy that may occur for any cause shall be filled for the unexpired term by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia from the list last submitted, as provided in section 1 of this act.

SEC. 4. That said board of osteopathic examiners of the District of Columbia shall, within 30 days after its appointment, organize by electing a president, a secretary, and a treasurer, who shall hold their offices until their successors are elected and qualified. The treasurer shall give bond with surety in such sum as said board may determine. Said board shall make such by-laws as may be necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act. There shall be at least one regular meeting of said board each year, and this meeting shall be held in the city of Washington on the last Tuesday in June. Special meetings may be held upon the call of the president and two members of the board. A majority of said board shall constitute a quorum. Said board shall adopt a seal, keep a record of its proceedings, and a register of all applicants for license to practice osteopathy in the District of Columbia. Said register shall show the name, date of birth, and place of residence of each candidate, and the name and location of the institution granting the applicant the degree of doctor of osteopathy, the date of his or her diploma, and also whether the applicant was denied or granted a license, and the number of the license granted. The record and register shall be prima facie evidence of all matters recorded therein.

SEC. 5. That all fees provided for in this act shall be paid in advance to the treasurer of the board of osteopathic examiners of the District of Columbia, to be held as a fund for the use of said board. No funds shall be paid out except on warrant signed by the president and secretary of said board, and no debt shall be created in excess of the fees and fines as herein provided; but such funds shall be applied by said board to the payment of its expenses and to making a compensation to each member thereof not to exceed $5 per diem for each day of actual service in the discharge of his duties under this act.

SEC. 6. That any person who was engaged in the practice of osteopathy in the District of Columbia on or before the approval of this act may deliver to the secretary of the board of osteopathic examiners of the District of Columbia, within 90 days after the approval of this act, a written application for a license to practice osteopathy in the District of Columbia, together with satisfactory proof that the applicant is of good moral character and had previously obtained a diploma from some legally incorporated school or college of osteopathy, and had been actively engaged in the practice of osteopathy in the District of Columbia for the past 10 years, or had previously obtained a diploma from some legally incorporated college of osteopathy whose requirements are equal to those as outlined in section 8 of this act, and upon payment of a fee of $25 said board shall issue to said applicant a license to practice osteopathy in the District of Columbia, which license shall have like effect for all purposes as a license issued after examination by said board of osteopathic examiners of the District of Columbia, as herein provided. Every license issued by said board of osteopathic examiners shall have affixed to it by the person authorized to affix the same the seal of said board of osteopathic examiners.

SEC. 7. That any person other than as provided in the preceding section who desires to enter on the practice of osteopathy in the District of Columbia, from and after the approval of this act, shall make a written application to the secretary of said board of osteopathic examiners for a license to practice osteopathy in the District of Columbia. Application shall be made upon a form prescribed by the board and shall be accompanied by a fee of $25, together with satisfactory proof that the applicant is an American citizen, is at least 21 years of age, is of good moral character, has completed a standard high-school course, and two years premedical standard college work, acceptable to the board, and has obtained a diploma from recognized college of osteopathy. Upon complying with these conditions said board of osteopathic examiners shall admit said applicant to examination before them, which examination shall include the subjects of anatomy, physiology, chemistry, toxicology, histology, pathology, bacteriology, diagnosis, hygiene, obstetrics, gynecology, surgery, medical jurisprudence, principles and practice of osteopathy, and diseases of the eye, ear, nose, and throat. If the applicant shall have made an average of not less than 75 per cent upon all subjects examined upon, with not less than 65 per cent in any one subject, said board of osteopathic examiners shall issue forthwith to said applicant a license to practice osteopathy in the District of Columbia, when it shall have been recorded in the office of the clerk of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia and the date and place of record has been certified thereon by said clerk; and the holder of the license shall pay to the clerk of said court a fee of $1 for making the record. The holder of said license shall, after the same has been recorded, exhibit the original at the health office and shall register, in a book which the health officer shall provide for that purpose, his or her name and address. Whenever a license is revoked by said board of osteopathic examiners, the secretary thereof shall report that fact in writing to the clerk of said court and to the health officer of the District of Columbia, who shall thereupon cancel such registration. In case the applicant fails to pass the examination, said applicant may, at any subsequent meeting of said board of osteopathic examiners, within two years, have the privilege of a second examination without the payment of additional fee.

SEC. 8. No college of osteopathy shall be approved by the board of osteopathic examiners as a college of recognized standing unless said college—

Requires for graduation or for the receipt of an osteopathic degree the completion of a course of study covering a period of not less than four school years of nine months each year in actual continuous attendance, of which not more than one school year is completed in any period of 12 months and during which time the following subjects are taught for at least the numbers of hours specified:

Anatomy (descriptive, regional, applied, surgical, and dissection), 600 hours; embryology, 70 hours; chemistry (advanced to include organic and physiological chemistry and toxicology), 300 hours; histology, 180 hours; physiology, 300 hours; pathology, 240 hours; bacteriology, 150 hours; hygiene, 60 hours; X-radiance, electrical diagnois, and treatment, 56 hours; hydrotherapy, 16 hours; dietetics, 32 hours. Osteopathy: a. Principles of osteopathy; b. osteopathic technique; c. practice of osteopathy, to include diseases of the nervous system, alimentary tract, heart and vascular system, genitourinary diseases, ductless glands, metabolism, respiratory tract, bone and joint diseases, corrective gymnastics, acute and infectious diseases, pediatrics, dermatology, syphilis, psychiatry, diagnosis (physical, laboratory, and differential), clinical practice and case recording, 1,466 hours; surgery, with emphasis on fractures, dislocations, principles of surgery, surgical diagnosis, orthopedics, orificial, and chemical, 400 hours; eye, ear, nose, and throat, 180 hours; gynecology, 160 hours; obstetrics, 200 hours; professional ethics and efficiency, 16 hours; jurisprudence, 16 hours; total, 4,442 hours.

The number of hours herein prescribed for the study of any subject may be reduced not more than 30 per cent, but the total number of hours prescribed shall not be reduced.

SEC. 9. O.," "osteopathic physician," or any other title or letters, either alone or with other qualifying words or phrases, under such circumstances as to induce the belief that the person who uses such term or terms is engaged in the practice of osteopathy, without having first complied with the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished for each offense by a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $500, or by imprisonment in the District jail for a period of not less than 10 nor more than 90 days, or by both such fine and imprisonment: Provided, That this act shall not apply to commissioned surgeons in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Hospital Service, nor to legally registered osteopathic physicians called from any State or Territory to attend specified cases in the District of Columbia, nor to practitioners of osteopathy during the period between the date of the approval of this act and the issue of license as provided by this act. SEC. 17. That all acts or parts of acts, general or special, not in accordance with the provisions of this act be, and are hereby, repealed.

During the reading of the bill the following occurred:

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I had hoped——

Mr. BLANTON (interposing). We are going to fully explain the bill to the gentleman.

Mr. CRAMTON (continuing). That the committee would be able to show whether any District authorities have approved this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. We will fully explain the bill to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

After the reading of the bill—

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas, a member of the committee, is recognized for one hour.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to regulate and control osteopathy. It was introduced by our friend, Mr. GIBSON, of Vermont. There is now no law in the District of Columbia to regulate osteopaths or to control them. There is such a law in all of the 48 States but not in the Nation's Capital, in the District of Columbia. Any shyster on earth can come here and practice osteopathy at will and the people of the District of Columbia are subjected to such a menace because of a want of law. This bill is designed to meet that situation.

I do not know whether you believe in osteopathy or not. You may not believe in it. You may be an allopath. You may believe in the old-line doctor of medicine, and I was brought up to believe that way.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. STEVENSON. I believe in both. I believe in the allopathic treatment for certain things and in osteopathic treatment for certain things. You have some of the best in this city that I know of anywhere. I have been treated by them. My health is about as near perfect as anybody's but I have been benefited by osteopaths in this city.

Mr. BLANTON. I had not gotten to the gentleman's class. There are some who believe in both. There are others who go still further and believe in chiropractors and other forms of healing. There may be some here who believe in Christian Science healing. Every person has the inherent right to choose for himself. We are all different in our beliefs, but whatever we believe we want all kinds of physicians and all kinds of healers who may prey upon the public to be properly regulated, licensed, and controlled.

This bill merely regulates and controls them and grants them licenses only after proper examinations. It requires a certain standard of training before they can get a license to practice here upon the helpless people. It requires a certain kind of examination to be passed before they can get a license to practice.

Now, my friend over here, who is an eminent old-line physician from Ohio, may not believe in them at all; but however he may believe about them, he wants them regulated and controlled and he does not want any shysters here who are unqualified to hold themselves out as healers of the people. That is all this bill does.

I did not feel like objecting to it in the committee, because I believe such a situation ought to be regulated and controlled. I did not feel like fighting it, so therefore I voted for it in the committee, and I expect to vote for it here. I think it is a good bill. I think the chiropractors here ought to be regulated. I have helped to report a bill in my committee to regulate and control them so they can not let shysters claiming to be chiropractors practice upon the helpless people when they are not qualified.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. I believe the chiropractors ought to be regulated, so why not amend this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Well, we have another bill pending to regulate chiropractors in the District. I will ask the gentleman from Michigan whether any action has been taken on that bill?

Mr. McLEOD. There have been no hearings upon it.

Mr. BLANTON. I was a member of the gentleman's committee last year, and we reported it favorably and it was on the calendar, but it died during the Senate jam.

Mr. McLEOD. Yes. I think this year it was referred to Mr. BOWMAN'S committee.

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask the gentleman from West Virginia what has become of that bill—the chiropractors' bill?

Mr. BOWMAN. The chiropractors' bill has not been reported out.

Mr. BLANTON. It was reported unanimously last year by the subcommittee and unanimously reported by the full District Committee and put on the calendar, but died there during the jam. The committee was in favor of it because they wanted to eliminate the shysters from the District and to properly control and regulate all of the practitioners.

Mr. GIBSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. GIBSON. I desire to say in regard to the general situation in respect of the osteopaths' bill that this is a bill that attempts to regulate the practice of osteopathy. There is no regulation at the present time.

Mr. BLANTON. None in the world; and there is no regulation of the chiropractors here in the District.

Mr. GIBSON. The osteopaths came to the committee, and the old-line physicians came to the committee. We told them to get together and agree upon some bill. They went away with the understanding that they would attempt to agree upon a bill to be introduced by the senior Senator from New York. This bill was introduced, but something happened to it in the other legislative body and the osteopaths came back to us and said: "We have been unable to agree on a general bill for the control of all of the practitioners, including the chiropractors." So they said: "You had better go ahead with the osteopath bill and we will make a beginning on that." Since that time I have learned that progress is being made on a general bill to bring all of these practitioners under one control, and that is the situation to-day. There is no control of any class now, except the old-line physicians.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman from Texas yield for me to ask a question of the gentleman from Vermont?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman states he feels now there is prospect of progress being made on a general bill?

Mr. GIBSON. I have been so informed.

Mr. CRAMTON. Does not the gentleman think that is the better legislation if it can be secured?

Mr. GIBSON. I think there should be legislation to bring all of these different cults under control.

Mr. CRAMTON. Then if the gentleman feels it is better to have the general legislation and the gentleman is advised there is now a prospect of that, why is it not better to lay this bill aside until the gentleman finds out what will happen to the general legislation?

Mr. GIBSON. That was the opinion of the members of the committee when they considered this bill, but when they came back and said, "We can not make any progress; you had better go ahead with the osteopath bill"——

Mr. CRAMTON. Then you reported this bill?

Mr. GIBSON. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. But now that you are advised that there is prospect of general legislation, why would it not be better to lay this aside until that situation develops. In view of what I have already said about the bill, I want it understood I am not opposed to regulation. As I have gone through this bill I have not been satisfied with its provisions and some questions have arisen about it; but I am in sympathy with the gentleman's purpose, and if there is to be general legislation, it would seem better to let this bill be laid aside until then rather than to have a multitude of separate boards functioning here.

Mr. GIBSON. I think the gentleman from Michigan is right. We ought not to have a lot of boards functioning for a common purpose, and, personally, I have no objection to its being laid aside with the distinct understanding that the bill will not be prejudiced by reason of its being laid aside.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan that the trouble about his suggestion is this: The District Committee has been trying for years to get these practitioners regulated, both osteopaths and chiropractors. Unfortunately, all the allopaths, the old-line doctors, are prejudiced against both the osteopaths and the chiropractors. They are greatly prejudiced. We can not blame them, because they were brought up in that faith, and as long as they can, the allopaths are going to keep any kind of recognition from being granted either to the osteopaths or to the chiropractors.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It seems to me, the principal objection to this bill is that it creates a sort of "lodge" board to examine among themselves, and there is the absence of one medical man on the board. It would seem to me these men ought to submit to an examination not created entirely as this bill would create this board.

Mr. BLANTON. The suggestion of the gentleman from New York is a good one. There ought to be a general bill and there ought to be some old-line doctors on the board, there ought to be some homeopaths on the board, there ought to be some osteopaths on the board, there ought to be some chiropractors on the board; they all ought to have a say as to the proper examination of a practitioner, but if you left it entirely to the allopaths they never would license one of them.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to my "allopath friend."

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. "All-path" is right, but not allo-path?

Mr. BLANTON. I call an old-line doctor an "allopath."

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. In Ohio we have a bill to this effect, and all of the "paths," all of the cults, are recognized, and we have a provision in the law of Ohio that every man who wants to practice medicine must pass an examination on all the fundamental branches.

Mr. BLANTON. I think that is a good law.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. It is a good law. Furthermore, the osteopaths need take no work on materia medica. He does not use medicine, but he must pass on every branch of medicine just the same as every attorney must pass on all branches of law.

Mr. BLANTON. That is what this bill provides he must do.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. But who are the examiners under this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. The bill provides that such a practitioner must be examined on every one of these branches.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But who are to be the examiners?

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. They are osteopaths.

Mr. BLANTON. I think the suggestion made by my friend, the gentleman from New York, is good, but this is the situation: Suppose you lay this bill aside, as suggested, and do not pass it; there will be no regulation for years.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. One moment, and then I will be pleased to yield.

Do you know it may be 5 years or 10 years before this general bill is agreed upon, and during that time you will have every kind of shyster in the world claiming to be a qualified osteopath and practicing on the people here in the District. We had a death here from one of the practitioners of one of these "paths" not long ago and it was a death that looked as if it was the result of criminal negligence. We do not want this to happen here again in the District. We want to make these practitioners responsible, and at the same time this will not prevent a general bill from amending this law. If we pass this bill and control them until the general bill is passed, we will have accomplished very much in behalf of the people here who otherwise may be improperly practiced upon.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman does not want to legalize the shyster?

Mr. BLANTON. No.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But we are going to make that possible through an examination by a board all their own.

Mr. BLANTON. When we pass the general bill we will fix it so that they will have to pass an examination by a board upon which all of the "paths" are represented—the allopaths, the homeopaths, the osteopaths, and the chiropractors.

I want to say to my friend from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] that I have never been rubbed by an osteopath like he has. I have never had my muscles or bones manipulated by a chiropractor, and neither have my family, but that is no reason why I should not want them to have a chance to practice under proper regulation upon Americans who believe in that kind of treatment. Americans have the right to choose their own treatment. I do not believe in that kind of healing. But there are many people who do, and they have a right to choose their own practitioner, but their practitioner ought to be regulated.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Did not the newspapers say the other day that a woman died receiving chiropractic treatment by a man who got a diploma from a school here?

Mr. BLANTON. That is what I called attention to in the first part of my remarks, when the gentleman's attention was diverted. There has been a death, and we do not want any more; we want them properly regulated.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. How many new attorneys would stand for a half dozen boards to say who should practice law? This board which you are trying to establish is controlled by the osteopaths.

Mr. BLANTON. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Suppose you were the sole board to pass on the granting of licenses to osteopaths. Would you grant any at all?

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. To a chiropractor?

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. Yes; if they were qualified.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say that since I have been on this District Committee I have helped in every way to pass a law that would drive these diploma-mill schools out of Washington. There are so-called schools here which have been granting diplomas with B. A. degrees when the applicants never attended a school a day. It was all done by correspondence. We have been trying to regulate and control them. But if you knew how long it takes to get a law passed by Congress you would be in a hurry to get some kind of a regulatory bill to control osteopaths and chiropractors.

Mr. KVALE. Is it not a fact that the real osteopaths desire to have this measure passed?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly, that is a fact. Every good practitioner in this line has been urging it—to get regulations to practice their own profession. I have received letters from prominent osteopaths all over the United States urging the passage of this bill. They want it for their own protection; they want to be relieved from improper practitioners. They do not want the faith in their cult reduced, and their cult brought into disrepute by some one practicing it who is not qualified. I think the bill should be passed, and I hope it will pass.

Now, I want to discuss one point concerning my friend from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN]. I want to say that whenever on the floor of this House there is a solemn agreement entered into between those who have charge of bills that that agreement ought to be kept. There ought not to be a single attempt to break a gentleman's agreement on the floor of this House.

I want to show you exactly what took place on the last District day when the policewoman's bureau bill was before the House, which had been discussed at length, a bill which has been before Congress every year almost since I have been here. I want to show you what took place. After a long discussion the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], the floor leader of the House, made this statement, which I read from the RECORD, page 5408, March 26, 1928. Mr. TILSON said:

> Mr. Speaker, it is evident there is going to be considerable discussion on this bill. A number of amendments are now pending including some committee amendments. It does not seem practical to finish the bill to-night unless we run until very late. I wonder if the District Committee would not be willing to let the matter go over as unfinished business until next District day.

That is the floor leader of the House speaking, and then the following occurred:

> Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of indifference to me whether this goes over as unfinished business until next District day or whether it is voted upon to-day or whether it is killed. That is a very frank expression, but I say let us get it out of the way.
> Mr. BLANTON. It would be better to have it go over as unfinished business until next District day, and then we can finish it.
> Mr. TILSON. It will go over as unfinished business, and it is for the committee to say what it will call up on next District day.

But we did not stop there. If we had, the gentleman from Maryland could have called up anything that he wanted to; but here is what occurred after that:

> Mr. BLANTON. We either ought to finish it this evening or have it go over as unfinished business to be taken up next District day.
> Mr. TILSON. Let it go over as unfinished business.
>
> Mr. BLANTON. And the chairman will bring it up as unfinished business on next District day?
> Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

There is your gentlemen's agreement. To continue:

> Mr. BLANTON. Very well, just so long as it holds its place.

There is your gentleman's agreement. It was to hold its place. It was solemnly agreed on the floor by the chairman of this committee, who has control of calling up bills, that he would call that bill up here on this District day as unfinished business. Unfinished business under such an agreement means to call it up the first thing.

If we have had a bill up here for consideration this evening and we move the previous question on the bill to final passage, it would be the unfinished business to-morrow, and the Speaker would have to put the vote on that bill the very first thing after the House met after matters on the Speaker's table had been disposed of.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is the practice in this House.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is right, because he is a good lawyer and a good parliamentarian. That is the practice. I think it a very unfortunate thing for the chairman of the committee to break a gentlemen's agreement. I have had high respect and regard for the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN], our chairman. I have worked shoulder to shoulder with and against him on that committee, and I have helped him expedite business and dispose of bills; but when he makes a solemn agreement he ought to keep it. Otherwise the membership of the House will not know where they are on legislation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has the chairman of the committee indicated that he will not carry out that agreement?

Mr. BLANTON. He not only indicated that, but he has called up another bill in violation of that agreement.

Mr. BANKHEAD. For what reason or excuse?

Mr. BLANTON. He said because he had agreed outside after we had adjourned, or some time later, with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] because he can not be here to-day, to put that bill aside. That was a private agreement with one Member.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield for an explanation if the gentleman has one.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I say to the gentleman from Texas, and also to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], that it is not the practice, to the best of my knowledge, after considering bills in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, when the committee rises, with the business before it unfinished, for the chairman to bring that bill up the next day on which the business of that committee is in order. That is true of the House, when the House adjourns with a matter of unfinished business on the table.

Mr. BLANTON. But it was in the House that the gentleman made that solemn agreement, and the floor leader of this House [Mr. TILSON] was the one who helped the gentleman enter into it.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The floor leader of this House stated in the RECORD last Friday that this bill would not come up.

Mr. BLANTON. He did not have any such authority to do it. I want it to go into the RECORD again just what we agreed, and I shall read it again.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I would like to have the gentleman read what is in the RECORD of last Friday. That is what I referred to. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] asked the floor leader on the majority side if this bill was to come up, and the floor leader stated that he understood the bill was not to be called up.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is just what we are objecting to.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Let me make this statement. My recollection is, although the RECORD does not show that, that I did say that I would bring the bill up, but I did not say in the RECORD that I would bring the bill up as the first matter of business on the next District day. The gentleman from Texas put those words in my mouth, and the only word that appears in the RECORD is the word "Yes." My recollection is that I agreed to bring the bill up, not as the first order of business.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. The bill that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] referred to on Friday last was not the policewoman's bill; it was the policemen's salary increase bill. That is the bill that is referred to, and not the bill now under discussion.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Maryland agreed on this floor as chairman of the committee, emphatically, without equivocation or evasion or mental reservation, that he would call the policewoman's bureau bill up as unfinished business to-day. I am going to read it over to you again, so there will not be any mistake about it. After the remark by Mr. TILSON, referred to, I said:

> It would be better to have it go over as unfinished business until next District day, and then we can finish it.
> Mr. TILSON. It will go over as unfinished business, and it is for the committee to say what it shall call up on the next District day.
> Mr. BLANTON. We either ought to finish it this evening or have it go over as unfinished business to be taken up next District day.
>
> Mr. TILSON. Let it go over as unfinished business.
>
> Mr. BLANTON. And the chairman will bring it up as unfinished business on next District day.
> Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.
> Mr. BLANTON. Very well, just so long as it holds its place.

If that is not a gentleman's agreement, I do not know what it is. And it was to hold its place.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. What bill does that refer to?

Mr. BLANTON. The policewoman's bureau bill, which we were discussing when the House adjourned on the last District day. We were then in the House. We then had up the policewoman's bureau bill, and it was understood it was to be called up by the chairman on this day as unfinished business. That is all I have to say. I am not falling out with the gentleman from Maryland. I am not his enemy. He ought to keep faith yet, and he ought to call this bill up now. He ought to keep faith with the House.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is this bill such an emergency bill that it has to be passed to-day?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. I will tell you why it is an emergency. There is not a single law now on the statute books that requires them to maintain a woman's police bureau here in Washington. If the District Commissioners should get mad with anybody in that bureau to-day, by a mere scratch of the pen they could wipe it out of existence here in the District. They could absolutely obliterate it. They could do away with every single one of them. They ought to have a law. That woman's bureau of the police department is defending the unprotected young girls that come here, who are away from home and subject to many dangers and perils. That bureau is protecting them and is protecting the integrity of the home in 48 States of the Union.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood the woman's bureau is on the same basis as the rest of the police department.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no. Any member of the District Committee could tell you that the District Commissioners could wipe them out by a mere scratch of the pen. That bureau ought to be made lawful. We ought to fix it so that the commissioners, by mere whim, can not wipe it out of existence. The press has been trying to wipe it out of existence ever since it has been here.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. HOLADAY. The gentleman from Texas is familiar, no doubt, with the fact that the women members of the police force occupy exactly the same status as the rest of the police force.

Mr. BLANTON. No. This woman's bureau could be wiped out with a scratch of the pen by the commissioners.

Mr. HOLADAY. Can not the other members of the police force be put out also?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no. The commissioners have no such authority as to the men.

Mr. HOLADAY. I think the gentleman will find that they are on the same status as all other policemen in the police department.

Mr. BLANTON. Although the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN] does not agree with me about calling up this bill, he will tell you the truth about this bureau. I ask him if it is not a fact that the woman's bureau is existing now by mere sufferance? There is no law for it, is there?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. There is no organic law for it, yet it has been carried on for years, and as long as it is appropriated for it will continue.

Mr. BLANTON. If the commissioners wanted to do so, they could stop it to-morrow.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. No. I think these policewomen have a civil-service status and could not be abolished without going through the usual procedure.

Mr. HOLADAY. They are exactly on the same footing as all other policemen, and the commissioners could wipe out precinct No. 4 to-day if they wanted to.

Mr. BLANTON. This bill has been up for 10 years before our committee. And we are now seeking to legalize the woman's bureau.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not pretend to be an authority on the subject, but I believe that, although the woman's bureau is set up without any specific legislation, the women on the force occupy the same status as the regular policemen, and while the bureau as a bureau might be abolished, the policewomen would still remain on the force. Is that right or not?

Mr. BLANTON. No; because when you wipe out the bureau under the commissioners' regulations you wipe them out with it.

Mr HOLADAY. It is the same as the detective bureau.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no; it is not. Because there is no law authorizing this woman's bureau.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEVENSON. I make the point of order that we were discussing the osteopath regulations here. Where does the woman's bureau come in? It strikes me that the discussion is getting far afield.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, the gentleman from South Carolina does not remember that on District day you can in general debate discuss anything that you want to.

Mr STEVENSON. I know that that has been done, but I thought there was some rule that would keep Members from doing it.

Mr. BLANTON. No. It is by the rules of the House which the gentleman helped to make himself.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina insist on his point of order? In the understanding of the Chair any subject can be discussed.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes. But I did not so understand it.

Mr. BLANTON. That rule has been in force ever since I have been here.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am satisfied that if I stayed here 24 years and the gentleman from Texas were here also I would learn at least one thing more before I got through. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman makes a point of order as facetiously as he has made the last one, he would learn.

Mr. Chairman, we ought to pass this bill controlling osteopaths, so that we will have some regulation; and I will say to my friend from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] that when the gentleman's general bill comes in, which he and my doctor friend from Ohio want to pass, I will vote for the bill as soon as we can get it out, and we will put on that board all the "paths" that practice on the human body.

Mr. SCHAFER. Turning again to the question of the woman's bureau in the police department, may I ask how many women police there are in the gentleman's district?

Mr. BLANTON. From what I have seen of the woman's bureau in the police department here in Washington I wish there was a similar one, equally qualified, in every town and city in Texas. I would vote for it, and I believe our people would be willing to pay the bill to protect our young girls and our young men from sundown to daylight.

Mr. SCHAFER. Have you any such bureaus in Texas?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly; we have them in nearly every large city.

Mr. SCHAFER. How many women have you on your police force?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I do not know the number, but we have more than you have in Milwaukee, I am sure. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas reserves the remainder of his time.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition in opposition to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for one hour.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to use an hour. I think possibly five minutes is all that I shall want. My position is not entirely one of opposition to the bill, although by reason of the statements made here by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON], the introducer of this bill, and the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BOWMAN], who has been active in the consideration of the bill in committee, I do believe we ought to lay the bill aside to-day and leave it for consideration after it has been definitely ascertained whether there is a possibility of the general bill passing. The general bill would be so much more effective and desirable as far as the general public is concerned, but if we once pass this bill and it becomes a law you will never get the osteopaths of the District to join in any general bill because this sews it up too nicely for those who have the leadership in that profession in the District.

Hoping it may be laid aside but desiring to give those in charge of the bill the benefit of some suggestions that have come to me as I have read it here on the floor, I want to call attention to some changes that ought to be made in this bill if it is to be passed.

In the first place, it is too much of a closed corporation proposition. No one will be permitted to practice osteopathy under this bill unless they receive a license. That license comes through the favorable action of a board and that board is appointed by the commissioners, but from names submitted by the Osteopathic Association of the District. So the bill puts it all in the hands of the Osteopathic Association.

This bill is in the interest of the public and not in the interests of the osteopaths, or should be at any rate, and, if so, the Commissioners of the District ought to have the authority to appoint any qualified persons whether they are members of the Osteopathic Association, recommended by them, or not.

Now, as to the fees. It may be the way these things are run, but it has not impressed me favorably as I have gone through the bill. Any one desiring to practice who lives in the District can get a license by paying a fee of $25 and then an annual fee of $3 a year. If you are already qualified to practice in some other State and want to practice here—having complied with every thing that this bill calls for, but you happen to be a resident of Ohio, New Jersey, or Texas and want to come here to practice—then, instead of paying $25, you must pay $50. I contend there should not be that discrimination. The fee should be the same for those from other States coming here as it would be for residents of the District.

Then those fees are assembled and they are not turned into the Treasury, but they are "held as a fund for the use of said board." There is very little effective limitation on the use of the money. The money is held, as the bill provides, for the use of such board and—

> Such funds shall be applied by said board to the payment of its expenses and to making a compensation to each member thereof not to exceed $5 per diem for each day of actual service in the discharge of his duties under this act.

That does not mean each day exclusively devoted to this work, because they could not afford to do so much for $5 a day, but for each day that they can make any pretense of doing any official business they can receive $5 a day, and as long as there is anything in that fund and it is entirely under their control, not controlled by anyone else, they are going to find enough days' employment to exhaust the fund.

The bill impresses me as loosely drawn and as involving some dangers. Section 11 provides:

> That the license provided for in this act shall authorize the holder to practice osteopathy as taught and practiced in the colleges of osteopathy as outlined in section 8, which practice shall include surgery, the use of narcotics, anesthetics, and antiseptics.

In other words, it looks to me as though one who graduates from a school of osteopathy and is examined by this board of osteopaths then has the right to go out and practice medicine and to act as a surgeon, the same as any physician now admitted to practice in the District.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Has the gentleman carefully considered the first section of this bill? It seems to me that leaves the entire matter in a sort of family circle.

Mr. CRAMTON. I have already suggested that. I will say frankly that I have not given long study to this bill. I have studied it here on the floor to-day, and what I am giving now are suggestions that I hope the committee will consider before they bring the bill up again. It certainly provides for a close corporation. What I am referring to now is section 11, which provides that anyone who is admitted to practice osteopathy has the right to act as a surgeon as well, but the training is not necessarily sufficient to warrant that being done. On the other hand, the bill is so drafted that an osteopath may act as a surgeon. In connection with what I have said as to section 11 you should also read section 12, which provides:

> Osteopathic physicians licensed hereunder shall have the same rights as physicians of other schools of medicine with respect to the treatment of cases or holding of offices in public institutions.

That is to say, an osteopath in any public institution shall have every right to treat any kind of a case through any school of medicine that any physician has.

And at the same time there is some question at least as to whether a regular physician and surgeon, already admitted to practice, can continue without interference by this bill. Of course, no one interested in the bill would admit that they intended to interfere with the rights of regularly qualified physicians or surgeons.

Now, as to section 14:

> That any person who shall fraudulently practice, or pretend to practice, or use the science or system of osteopathy in treating diseases of the human body—

And other things, is subject to a penalty if—under such circumstances as to induce the belief that the person who uses such term or terms is engaged in the practice of osteopathy, without having first complied with the provisions of this act.

Now, there is another section, section 16, which provides:

That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent or in any way interfere with any person engaging in the art of healing in the manner taught by any school of medicine or science, except such as claim to be osteopathic physicians or practice osteopathy.

This section (sec. 16) is put in to reassure the physician that his practice will not be interfered with. Now, if this is the case, I do not understand the purpose of the proviso in section 14. A physician may see fit to prescribe certain things that are prescribed in osteopathy, and if so, there is a chance he might be subject to the penalty of section 14. Notwithstanding section 16, which I have read, it has been thought necessary to put in a proviso—that this act shall not apply to commissioned surgeons in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Hospital Service.

If the act, without this proviso, was held as likely to interfere with surgeons in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Hospital Service, then it applies likewise to surgeons and physicians who are not in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Hospital Service, and hence there is liability of some interference with their practice. I am suggesting this for the careful consideration of the committee.

I now yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. The license that will be granted under this bill will specifically provide that no knife whatever shall be used by any one of these practitioners.

Mr. CRAMTON. There is not a word in the bill to indicate that; but, on the contrary, there is the express language, as definite as it can be made, that he is authorized to practice osteopathy as taught and practiced in the colleges of osteopathy as outlined in section 8, which practice "shall include surgery," and then the proviso—that no osteopathic physician licensed under this act shall practice surgery who has not had a four-year course in an accredited osteopathic college.

I do not want to turn somebody out here with a diploma or a license that authorizes them to cut folks up when he has not had the right kind of training for that particular kind of practice.

Mr. BLANTON. The allopaths themselves required those provisions to be put in the bill—that they should be well versed and trained in both surgery and medicine, and the provisions were put in at the suggestion and instance of the allopaths.

Mr. CRAMTON. All right; if the gentleman refers back to that point, the bill is not so drawn as to make it at all certain that the person authorized to practice under it will be duly qualified, because he is to be examined by a board that probably is not versed in both schools of medicine.

I simply urge the committee therefore to lay the bill aside and let the general bill have a chance; and later, if this bill is brought up, we would hope to have some of the defects in it worked out.

Mr FROTHINGHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Surgery as used in this bill would include the use of a knife, bone surgery, and every other kind of surgery.

Mr. CRAMTON. There is no limitation upon it so far as the bill is concerned. It explicitly, directly, and expressly gives the right to anyone who has a permit or license under this act to practice surgery.

Mr. BLANTON. Under the present situation shysters claiming to be osteopaths can do anything they want in the District of Columbia without any regulation whatever.

Mr. CRAMTON. There is a peculiar situation here in the District of Columbia in that the commissioners and the police force seem to be quite powerless to do anything to stop any kind of evil or nuisance unless Congress passes a specific act reaching it. We had an illustration of this recently. There is nothing which is a bigger nuisance than these gypsy camps on Pennsylvania Avenue. I wrote to the chief of police some time ago and called his attention to them and to their practice of accosting all the men who go by. I walk back and forth frequently from the Capitol to my home, and I have seen these women tapping and inviting passers-by to come in, and on several occasions I have seen altercations on the sidewalk when some old man would engage in a row with a gypsy The only time the man gypsy shows up, dressed in his good clothes, is when there is a row on or an argument with the police force. This is a nuisance, and what is the answer when you ask them to eliminate this scandal from Pennsylvania Avenue. They say, "We can not, because they are not licensed. If there was a law permitting us to give them a license, we could take their license away from them."

Mr. W T. FITZGERALD and Mr. LAGUARDIA rose.

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield first to the gentleman from Ohio. I believe the gentleman was on his feet first.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. The medical profession in my State has recognized the so-called irregular cults or the irregular practice that they may have in use. The law of the State of Ohio permits the practice of these irregular practitioners of fads, but they must pass an examination just the same as any physician passes. They take this examination after they have taken all the branches of medicine, except materia medica, the prescribing of drugs, the administration of chloroform, ether, morphine, and so on. They take everything that the medical man takes except this. It has been stated that this bill sets out a list of the various branches upon which they must be examined, but the board of examiners is a special board, whereas in our State we have one board which passes on all the medical men and all the cults.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. You do regulate the practitioners of these so-called healing arts?

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. They are regulated just the same as I am regulated.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. And is it not a fact that every jurisdiction in the country has some regulation of these sciences or professions except the District of Columbia?

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. That is all right, and I am glad to see it, but this is an inopportune time to bring this up. The bill is not complete. I did not come here to-day expecting to say a word about this matter, but I have been in close touch with several men in the regular practice of medicine, and when I say "regular" I mean the practice of medicine and the administration of drugs and anesthetics, and so on.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Michigan will yield, and the gentleman from Ohio will indulge me, I will state to the gentlemen that when the Committee on the District of Columbia reported this bill, it was stated in our committee that the so-called Copeland bill, which was to provide one general board to regulate all of these professions, had been pigeon-holed for the balance of the session and that the regular medical society of practicing physicians, composed of the physicians who administer drugs, anesthetics, and so on, to which the gentleman from Ohio referred, had indorsed this bill with the provisions which they asked be written in the bill.

The committee therefore reported this bill. Since that time the so-called Copeland bill has been revived and reported to the Senate. But if it is agreeable to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and the District of Columbia Committee, after consulting with the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BOWMAN] in charge of this legislation, chairman of the District of Columbia Committee will, under unanimous consent, withdraw the bill temporarily.

Mr. CRAMTON. All the gentleman needs to do is to move that the committee rise and let this bill join the policewomen's bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I will say that it is very evident here now in the present temper of the committee that unless the gentleman does as the gentleman from Michigan wants him to do that probably the enacting clause will be stricken out. These people ought to be regulated and the bill ought to be passed, but in order to preserve the bill and let it have a chance, I think the gentleman should let it go over.

Mr. CRAMTON. I think the gentleman from Maryland means to do that.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maryland asked the gentleman from Ohio if it is not true that there is some regulation of osteopaths in all the jurisdictions of the Nation except the District of Columbia. It is true as to every jurisdiction except this that some sort of regulation prevails. When this bill was drafted we attempted to have it conform to the standard in most of the States. The result is the bill we have here—it is identical with the laws of a great many States. We want such a law as will work. It is essential that the osteopaths who practice in the District of Columbia should be regulated. There is no regulation for any class now; they can do anything under heaven, get up any sort of cult they please, and practice on human beings. I have no objection to the bill being laid aside in order that we may get it perfected.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And I want five minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield the floor.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON].

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I take this opportunity to call the attention of the House to a signal honor which has recently come to Kentucky and the district which I have the honor to represent.

Last week the National High School Basket Ball Tournament was held in Chicago. Hundreds and hundreds of games had been held throughout the Nation to determine the State championships and to determine each State's representative in the national meet. The cream of the high school basket-ball players—40 teams—met in Chicago to determine who would be the survivor of the fittest. It is with just pride I mention that the national championship was won by the Ashland (Ky.) High School team. [Applause.]

In deciding the championship of Kentucky, Carr Creek and Ashland entered the finals. At the conclusion of the fourth quarter, the game was a tie and four overtime periods were required to determine the winner. The Ashland team emerged the winner with the score 13 to 11. So both teams were entered in the national tournament at Chicago.

The Carr Creek team represented a little mountain school in Knott County, Ky., in the district so splendidly represented by the gentlewoman from Kentucky [Mrs. LANGLEY]. I have been informed that the male student body in this school is some 40 in number; that the school building is some 20 by 26 feet in size; that most of their basket-ball experience was gained upon a ground court. Yet this little mountain team won from Albuquerque, N. Mex.; Austin, Tex., one of the best teams at the meet; and Bristol, Conn., the last surviving eastern representative. On Friday night, last, it was compelled to bow its head in proud defeat to the gallant Vienna, Ga., team. After the elimination of Austin, Tex., Vienna was the favored team to win the national championship.

A striking example of the good feeling which pervaded the contests, together with the fact that little Carr Creek won its way into the hearts of even their opponents, is seen in the sportsmanship and friendly feeling of the Bristol, Conn., team which was eliminated by this Kentucky team. The Bristol team presented to each Carr Creek player a watch, donated by the Bristol Chamber of Commerce, with appropriate congratulatory wishes of luck. In this connection it might be said that anyone can be a good winner, but it takes a good sport to be a good loser.

With Carr Creek eliminated, Ashland—in my district—was the sole Kentucky representative. Naugatuck, Conn.; Oregon, Mo.; Morris, Ala., who had survived the rounds preliminary to meeting Ashland, had been disposed of in hotly contested games. On Saturday afternoon the Ashland team revenged the defeat of Carr Creek and took the Vienna team into camp in one of the hardest-fought games of the tournament. The score was 20 to 19.

The championship game was played Saturday night between the Canton, Ill., team the sole survivor in the other bracket, and the Ashland team. The Kentucky team won, and honors the entire State in bringing home the trophy emblematic of the national championship.

Every true Kentuckian thrills with just pride in Ashland's victory. It was a tremendous task assigned to any team. In winning the championship Ashland exhibited skill, sportsmanship, and courage that warmed the hearts of all those who witnessed the games.

Heretofore splendid American youths have won this coveted honor, which means so much to them but even more to the other youths of the land. They have earned the highest honor in this particular athletic field—and all is not milk and honey in reaching the peak of athletic activity. Many sacrifices of personal pleasure must be made; strenuous and prolonged physical training must be had to be crowned champion in any national athletic contest.

An unprecedented thing occurred in this tournament which demonstrates beyond peradventure that the Ashland team were possessed of that skill, discipline, and spirit of gentlemanly sportsmanship that their minds, hearts, and muscles were coordinating perfectly. With the red blood of American youth coursing their veins, with the desire to win subordinating, for the time, every purpose in life these gentlemen representing Old Kaintuck played throughout the tournament without committing a personal foul. [Applause.]

So I say to the country that whereas the other nine teams who have in the past won the national trophy, proclaiming them national champions in this athletic endeavor, were representative, clean, American youths, holding the trophy in their possession without stain and with proper dignity, that the Ashland team measures up in every respect to the champions of yore and that this trophy, so significant, has been placed in worthy hands for the ensuing year. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, a matter far more important than the bill under consideration or the withdrawal of that bill is the question of the rules, the practice and custom of this House. Some of us have taken an interest in the rules of the House and have sought from time to time to liberalize them. The incident that happened this morning, if followed, would destroy what has taken years to establish in this parliamentary body. There was a time when no Member could call up a bill unless he was recognized by the Speaker for that purpose. Every Member of the House was at the absolute mercy of the Speaker. Conditions become so intolerable that the whole country protested, and the war on so-called Cannonism was started in this House. Out of that rules were obtained which provided for Calendar Wednesday, which provided for the Consent Calendar, which set aside a day for the District of Columbia business and so on, and which provided the procedure in this House that Members would have notice of what would be before it. No one in the House to-day would now dare attempt to modify the existing rules and practice and go back to the old system.

Under the practice in this House it is never necessary to question any understanding made by any Member on the floor of the House. It is not even necessary to question a gentlemen's agreement made at any time in reference to the orderly procedure and consideration of legislation in this House. I am not concerned in the woman's police bill at all. That bill was before the House on the last District day, and upon the committee rising and going into the House, before adjournment, it was understood by definite agreement that the bill was the unfinished business and would be taken up to-day. That understanding was binding and in accordance with the custom and practice of the House was sacred. If we countenance what has happened to-day, we are going to break down what took years to establish in this House. Members must retain confidence in their colleagues. This is not a slight matter. The incident which happened to-day should not be repeated in a hundred years. I understand that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN] was motivated by the best intentions. Perhaps he wanted to accommodate his colleague, but all those matters are of no consideration when an agreement is made in accordance to established practice and custom of the House. That agreement provided that the woman's police bill would be the unfinished business and taken up on a certain day.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I did not state that the bill would come up first. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that if the chairman of the committee is compelled to take up business that is not finished in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, he will reach an impasse, because he must bring up all that legislation before he can bring up legislation to which there is no opposition.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I thank the gentleman for calling my attention to that. The unwritten law of this House is that we do not play with words. It was the clear intent of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] that the bill then under discussion would be the unfinished business of to-day, and what has happened? That bill has not been called up, in violation of an agreement made in accordance with the practice and custom of this House. We have lost two hours on a bill that is now withdrawn from consideration.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Just a moment. We have lost two hours, and the chairman of the committee now asks unanimous consent to withdraw the bill. That shows how you can block legislation. It does not require great knowledge of parliamentary law. It is easy to block legislation and the consideration of bills in the House by simply disregarding the rules and practice of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. The word "unfinished" means that that legislation shall be called up first at the next meeting, especially when it was so specifically agreed.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There is no question as to the meaning and intent of the agreement; there is no question as to what was in the mind of the gentlemen at the time. As I say, I am against this bill. It has to be corrected. I have no interest in the unfinished bill, but I am interested in the orderly procedure of the House and in the rights of Members being protected.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Perhaps the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN] is going to call up that unfinished business. I respectfully submit that this is the first time the question of not taking up this bill has been raised. Why was not the question raised when the House went into committee?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It was.

Mr. SCHAFER. By whom?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. By the gentleman from Texas and others. It was raised very forcibly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MAPES rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Michigan rise?

Mr. MAPES. I move to strike out the last word, if that is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is under general debate.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman from Michigan wants some time, I shall be glad to yield to him.

Mr. MAPES. I ask for recognition in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for one hour.

Mr. MAPES. That will be a little longer than I care to occupy.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that on District day there are but two hours of general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that there is no such rule.

Mr. BLANTON. That has been the rule here ever since I have been a Member.

The CHAIRMAN. That is on Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman from Texas is confusing District with Calendar Wednesday business.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to inject myself into this debate, but I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] in his discussion of the proper procedure to be followed should distinguish more clearly than he has between the rules of the House and any so-called gentlemen's agreement that may have been made relating to the woman's bureau bill. Of course, unfinished business means, as the term indicates, unfinished business. But the rules of the House and the precedents provide that unfinished business can be called up at the will of the committee. There is no rule that requires the committee to call up unfinished business on any particular day, unless my recollection is wrong. I should be surprised if the gentleman from New York should find any such rule. My recollection on the subject is quite clear, although I am not able to refer to the precedent in the rules at the moment, but the rule, as I remember it, even goes so far as to apply to Calendar Wednesday business, and permits business unfinished on Calendar Wednesday to be laid aside and other business in order on Calendar Wednesday to be called up by the committee having charge of the legislation. That, of course, has no reference to any gentlemen's agreement or anything of that kind. I think the rules of the House very clearly justify this committee, if it sees fit to do it, to lay aside the so-called woman's bureau bill and bring up any other bill it pleases.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will read the RECORD, he will see that it was the distinct understanding that this bill should not be displaced, but should be called up at the next session or the next day when District business was taken up.

Mr. MAPES. I was here at the time that colloquy took place, and I know something about the desire of several members of the Committee of the Whole at the time. But the gentleman from Michigan was not discussing that feature at all. He was discussing the rules without reference to any gentlemen's agreement. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], I think, spoke rather broadly in his discussion of the procedure as applied to the rules and precedents as distinguished from any agreement.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman will admit, I am sure, that it is the practice of this House, when there is unfinished business, and the committee rises, and the question is raised, and it is stated that unfinished business would be taken up on the next day given to that committee, to see that that is done. This would be the practice of the House.

Mr. MAPES. Yes; if it is agreed that the bill would be taken up as unfinished business on the next legislative day. Yet the gentleman is in error when he says the rules of the House require the calling up of the bill as unfinished business, regardless of any agreement.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes; I yield to my colleague.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am not going to discuss the agreement that has been made, but the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], it seems to me, goes further than the rules warrant. I think he confuses certain classes of unfinished business with other classes of unfinished business. There is a certain stage that a bill reaches on the day given to it where it has a priority right, but there appears to be a specific precedent which I think justifies the position of the gentleman from Michigan. In the House Manual, in the notes under section 863, it is stated that on the District of Columbia day business unfinished on the preceding District day is in order for consideration, but does not come up unless called up. That is covered in Hinds' Digest, volume 4, page 3307.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There is no question about that.

Mr. CRAMTON. It has to be called up. It is not before the House by priority right. The facts are the same here, barring this gentlemen's agreement.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is what I am complaining about.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentlemen's agreement is separate and apart from the general rule, and that is not a thing I desire to argue. In other words, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN] had the right to call up the woman's bureau bill or not. Whether he was entirely keeping faith in that connection is a question but as a parliamentary right he has the right to call it up.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman will concede that three-quarters of the business of this House is carried on by mutual understanding, and we can not disregard that.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I will yield to the gentleman from Vermont. I have said all I care to say.

Mr. GIBSON. I think in all fairness it should be stated that the bill as it appears here, the woman's police bill, was reported out by the committee exactly as the committee voted it should be reported. When the committee came to the consideration of the bill at the last District day the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] suggested that he had some amendments that he would like to offer, and as the author of the bill I agreed to at least one of the amendments, and I agreed that he should have full opportunity to present such amendments as he wished to present when the bill came up for final action here. Now, it so happens that the gentleman from Massachusetts necessarily is out of town to-day and can not be here, so that it is only fair, Mr. Chairman, that he should have an opportunity to present his amendments.

Now, may I make this suggestion, that this bill be taken up on next District day with this understanding, that on the next District day it shall be the unfinished business. Will not that obviate any further controversy?

Mr. BLANTON. That should also be done in the House.

Mr. GIBSON. Will that be agreeable to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. BLANTON. I think so. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] is away because of serious sickness in his family. I saw him this morning about 10.30 o'clock and then learned of such sickness. I am perfectly willing that the bill should go over until the next District day, with the same agreement that it should be in order on the next day.

Mr. GIBSON. The gentleman from Texas and I are in accord.

Mr. BLANTON. But we should also make this agreement in the House.

Mr. GIBSON. It is apparent that we now have harmony out of all this controversy.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Maryland will also make the request in the House.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I will repeat that I only rose because it seemed to me that arguments and statements were being made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] which confused the rules and precedents of the House with any understanding that might have been made, and in what I said I was clearly distinguishing between an understanding and the rules and precedents of the House.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In all fairness, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MAPES. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not believe it is fair for the gentleman to say that the gentleman from New York did not state the rules properly when you assume a new state of facts. I was talking on a concrete proposition before the House. If the gentleman simply takes the naked rules and disregards existing facts, of course, he can find the gentleman from New York in error, but I was discussing a concrete proposition and I stand by every word I said.

Mr. MAPES. Of course, the gentleman from Michigan would not attempt to misstate what the gentleman from New York had in his mind. I am only stating the impression which what he said left upon my own mind, and the impression I gained from what he said was that he was carrying his argument to an extreme and, as I repeat, I understood the effect of his argument to be to confuse the rules and precedents of the House with any understanding that might have been made.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CHINDBLOM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16, to regulate the practice of osteopathy in the District of Columbia, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be laid aside as the unfinished business of the committee.

The SPEAKER. That is not necessary. That is the state of facts as they exist.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement. On the last District day, as chairman of the committee, I entered into an agreement with the majority leader as to the order in which various legislation was to be brought up in the House. I presume I owed the courtesy of consultation with the gentleman from Texas, but owing to the fact that it was late in the week and I was busy on that day I did not get an opportunity to consult with him.

On the last District day the gentleman from Texas came to the chairman of the committee and asked that this policewoman's bill be put further up in the order of business agreed to, which I could not agree to do in view of the agreement I had already entered into with the majority leader. When we reached that bill in the order agreed to I called it up and it was evident from the opposition which developed that the bill could not be considered and finished on that day, and upon the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas himself, I think, the bill was laid aside. I was in my seat on the floor when the colloquy occurred between the majority leader and the gentleman from Texas. The gentleman from Texas appealed to me and I was under the impression that I had stated I would bring the bill up. I did not know I was recorded in the RECORD merely as saying "yes." The RECORD, of course, containing only that brief statement was not submitted to me and I had no opportunity of correcting it, because it was not called to my attention.

Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] came to me and said he was called out of town on account of sickness and that he wanted to offer certain amendments to this bill. The chief objection he had to the bill—and he did not oppose the bill in the committee—was that it referred to an intangible document known as the police manual for the interpretation of the bill. The gentleman from Massachusetts said he had read the several pages of the manual; that it was a bad form of legislation; that it was not what he had agreed to in the committee, and he wanted to strike it out. I did not know at that time whether or not we were going to take up District legislation in the House to-day, but I agreed I would not call it up. Now, the gentleman from Texas, in his usual very adroit way, oftentimes puts a word in the mouth of the chairman. I did not know that he had pinned me down to the understanding that I would call up this bill first. I believed then and I believe now I was acting entirely within my rights when I called up other legislation first.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that H. R. 6664, authorizing and legalizing a policewoman's bureau in the District of Columbia, be made the first order of unfinished business on the next District day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that is necessary. It is entirely within the discretion of the committee.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Well, I will make the statement on the floor that I will call it up, provided it is agreeable to the House, upon the next District day.

Mr. BLANTON. Just so the gentleman keeps his agreement with me made on the last day, it is all right.

Mr. HOLADAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. HOLADAY. Was not the osteopath bill laid aside as unfinished business, and would not that bill come ahead of the policewoman's bureau bill?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The Speaker has stated that is a matter in the discretion of the committee. According to the interpretation of the rules placed upon them by the gentleman from New York, no other legislation could be called up except the unfinished business.

Mr. HOLADAY. And the unfinished business would be the osteopath bill?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I do not think so.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, there are two items of unfinished business, and either one of them that is called up is before the House.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In the absence of a specific agreement.

Mr. CRAMTON. None gets before the House unless it is called up.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman from Maryland yield to me for a question?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. When may we reasonably expect the House to have an opportunity of considering the bill raising the salaries of the members of the Metropolitan police force?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have the regular order.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that in view of my rather unpleasant experience to-day, I would rather not commit myself on that question.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will that bill come up at this session?

Mr. ROMJUE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. ROMJUE. When are we to understand this osteopath bill is to be considered?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I do not wish to make any agreement about that. The gentleman heard the statement made that an attempt was being made to work out a general bill. I would not like to be bound by any other agreement except the one I have already put in the RECORD.

Mr. ROMJUE. Does the gentleman have any objection to taking it up immediately following the policewoman's bureau bill?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I have no objection, I will say to the gentleman, to taking up either one of these bills, but I would not like to enter into any agreement about it.

Mr. ROMJUE. In the absence of any agreement, when does the gentleman think it is likely to come up? It is a bill that has been before the gentleman's committee and I would like to know when the gentleman thinks it is likely to come before the House again, without the gentleman being bound by what he may say.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will state to the gentleman it has been suggested here by some of the Members who have made a study of District legislation that it would be much better if a general bill could be passed providing for an examining board for all of these healing arts, and that some progress has been made and the bill has been reported to the Senate. It is probable if that bill is passed and comes before our committee, the committee will report that bill and have it before the House, and in that event it would be given priority. However, that is a matter over which the chairman has no control and would not like to be bound by any promise.

Mr. ROMJUE. Does the bill the gentleman just referred to involve the regulation of the practice of osteopathy in the District of Columbia?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Osteopathy and chiropractic.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

SALARIES OF PARK POLICE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 1628) relating to the Office of Public Building and Public Parks of the National Capital.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill, which is a small measure, may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BLANTON. I object to that. It ought to be considered in committee.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 1628), and pending that I ask unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be dispensed with.

Mr. BLANTON. No; we want 30 minutes to the side on this bill.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Then pending the motion, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate may be limited to one hour, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and one-half to be controlled by myself.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. It is evident there is not a quorum present.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

SHEPHERD OF THE HILLS NATIONAL PARK

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill (H. R. 11477) for a national park in southwest Missouri, known as the Shepherd of the Hills National Park, including a statement by the meteorologist of Springfield, Mo., and an article by Professor Danes, of Prague.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, my purpose at this time is to discuss the Ozark Mountains in southwest Missouri where it is proposed to establish the Shepherd of the Hills National Park as provided in H. R. 11477.

The immediate "Shepherd of the Hills" country, made famous by nature and Harold Bell Wright's beautiful story, "The Shepherd of the Hills," comprises approximately 10,000 acres of land in the western part of Taney County and the eastern part of Stone County, in southwest Missouri, a distance of 45 miles from Springfield, approximately 75 miles southwest of Carthage and Joplin, 260 miles from Kansas City, and 300 miles from St. Louis. It may be reached over the Missouri Pacific Railroad or by auto over Federal highways 43 and 65.

In addition to other natural advantages and attractions the climate is delightful all the year. In front of "Old Mat's post office," at Garber, Mo., one of the railroad points for the Shepherd of the Hills country, and the last home of "Old Mat," the thermometer often registers 60° and 70° F. during the winter and never registers excessive heat through the summer.

Luella Agnes Owen, in writing about this territory, says:

> It seems designated for a national park. Such a park reserve, even if very small, could not fail to be a lasting pleasure, since it would be more accessible to large centers of population than other reserves, and its most delightful seasons are spring and autumn, when the Yellowstone is under snow.

This region has a peculiar geological history not repeated in any other portion of the earth's surface, is blessed with its own distinctive style of scenery, and vies with all the world for the supremacy of its wonderful caves. This claim is not based on an unworthy spirit of rivalry or desire to minimize or deny the charm and beauty of other well-known sections of the earth, but is simply an announcement that nestling in the heart of the Ozarks in south Missouri is a section that challenges the admiration of all lovers of nature and scenic beauty, a truly charming spot with a marvelous store of unusual attractions, both extremely old and wholly new.

The country is uneven, rolling, mountainous, reaching an altitude of 1,500 feet, a panorama of scenic beauty, cut with streams, gorges, canyons, and covered with forest trees. Here wonderful lakes, sparkling springs, and magic streams are found—beautiful Lake Tanacomo, the White River, and the James. Here undulating hills uplift their fretted summits, tipped with pointed cedar, graceful pine, or rounded oak. Here yawning caverns and labyrinthian caves abound in weird formation to charm the mystery-seeking soul.

Here the tourist, the health seeker, the research worker, and the scientist will find a place that satisfies—a place where they can breathe the pure atmosphere, drink from the curative waters, explore the mysteries of underground caverns, or bask in the white light of eternal sunshine close to nature and to nature's God.

Marvel Cave, one of the wonders of America, the entrance to which is near the top of Roark Mountain, is unique in its ease of access, charm of location, and variety of its structure. Though many of its mysteries are yet unexplored the very heart of the universe is revealed as you move from room to room through the infinite variety of passages penetrating the secrets of the oldest geological formation in America. The auditorium alone should give Marvel Cave a world-wide fame even if there were nothing more beyond. It is an alluring chamber of vast dimensions with the largest unsupported dome known. The blue-gray limestone walls sweeping away from any given point in long graceful curves, form an ellyptical chamber 350 feet long, 125 feet wide, the vault above having absolute perfection of arch, measuring 195 feet from the lowest to the highest point, and being the largest unsupported perfect arch in the world. In addition to the artistic superiority of architectural form its acoustic properties are unexcelled. On every clear day at high noon this great auditorium, or grand amphitheater as it is sometimes called, is temporarily lighted by natural light, presenting a most unusual scene. Owen in describing her visit to Marvel Cave several years ago, with respect to this spectacular phenomenon, says:

> Our eyes having grown accustomed to the dim light of candles in passages where absolute darkness, unrelieved by the stars of midnight, always reigns, the great auditorium appeared before us softly flooded with daylight diffused from a broad wide beam slanting down in long straight lines from the entrance as from a rift in heavy clouds; only this rift displayed around its edges a brilliant border of vegetation that the rough rocks cherished with tender care. As we stood lost in almost speechless admiration, and without the slightest warning of treasure yet in store, the white beam was stabbed by a narrow, gleaming shaft of yellow sunlight. The glorious radiant beauty of the picture presented is utterly indescribable, but it was of short duration, and in a few seconds the golden blade was withdrawn as suddenly as it had appeared.
> If the genius of Elkins had been granted the privilege we enjoyed, the artist world of Europe that graciously yielded the highest honor to his "Sunbeam on Mount Shasta" would have knelt in rapturous humility. Speaking of his great work as we stood before it only a few months before his death, Mr. Elkin said quietly: "It is no great achievement; I simply painted it exactly as it looked. Anyone could do the same." But no one ever has.

The great white throne, a mammoth stalagmite, 80 feet high, the largest known, the Battery, the Belfry, and Blondey's Throne, are other forms of nature's architecture, marvelous in design and unexcelled in beauty. Mystic River, Lost River, the waterfall of 90 feet, together with many other attractions, are to be found. As you follow the trails and passages you come to a spring called the Fountain of Youth, and on down 400 feet the studio of Harold Bell Wright, the author of the Shepherd of the Hills.

Unique in magic beauty, Fairy Cave challenges the fame of all the cave family. The Grand Corridor is 225 feet long, 40 feet wide, and 125 feet high, abounding in grotesque forms, stalactites clear as crystal, and stalagmatic formation of enormous size, shades, and delicate tints. The Flag, the Owl, the Kissing Kewpies, and Cæsar's Throne are among the groups of striking beauty and interesting design. Many other caves of unusual interest are found throughout this territory.

It would be impossible for me to picture the beauty and charm of this fascinating playground of the West, but when—you have fished its streams, floated in a canoe through the blue magic of its moonlight, cantered over its trails with the freshness of early morning, and slept, night after night, beneath its stars; when you have come to know the land in the misty tenderness of springtime, the full-blossomed beauty of summer, and the amazing gold and purple pageantry of flaming autumn, then you will find that the charm of Ozarkland has stolen into your heart.

When you see bluffs as romantic as those above the castled Rhine, as picturesque as the palisades of the Hudson; when you see mountains as untamed as the Adirondacks, as wild and craggy as the highlands of the West; when you see sunsets as glorious as those of Arizona or California, moonlight as bewitching as the Venetian or the Japanese; when you behold Dewey Bald standing in the gray gates of the dawn, aloof, stupendous, majestic, staggering in the intensity of its own beauty, and keeping eternal vigil over the Shepherd of the Hills country; when you behold all this, then you will understand the thoughts that absorbed the mind of "Preachin' Bill" when he said:

Taint no wonder 't all God rested when he made these here Ozark hills. He just naturally had to quit, for He done his beatenest an' war plum gi'n out.

Nowhere in all the world is a land blessed with a more salubrious climate, more invigorating and health-giving springs, more inspiring and impressive scenery, inhabited by a more hospitable and congenial people than this favored section of our national domain, where nature has wrought wonders with a lavish hand.

And this way runs the trail that leads to the higher sunlit hills where those who journey see afar and the light lingers even when the day is done.

Here we invite you to pitch your tent, here in the heart of the Ozarks, in nature's wonderland, the all-year playground of the Nation—"the land of a million smiles."

What country has inspired the poet to climb to higher heights or tell the truth in nobler strain than Will Feerell when he said:

Land of a million smiles. Dame Nature's kiss
Upon the brow of yonder purple peak
Clings long and soft and tender as she speaks
A bright "Good morning" after dreams of bliss.
Far down the shadowed aisles, an opal veil
Is lifted from each winding, rugged trail,
Disclosing underneath, the plunging streams—
The silver threads which bound our night of dreams.

The orange glow arising over all;
The drowsy glens, the vine-clad granite wall,
Forecasts the day as beauties manifold
Take shape and bloom in varied tints of gold.
Land of a million smiles and throbs and thrills;
Land of the kindly Shepherd of the Hills;
The poet's theme—the harpist's joy;
The human gold of earth without alloy;
Rare films of rapture yet unfurled,

In these, the Ozarks—garden of the world.
God clothed the Rockies with eternal snows;
The Alleghenies with the juniper and rose.
When all was done, some odds and ends remained—
The choicest of them all. These He retained.
He painted and adorned each precious part
And flung the whole into the Nation's heart.
There shall they lie. There shall they bless mankind,
The fairest spot of all the earth designed.

The following statement as to climatic conditions in the Ozarks, in southwest Missouri, was recently given by W. W. Talbott, meteorologist, at Springfield, Mo.:

The climate of the Ozark region clearly shows the influence of altitude. Afternoon temperatures in midsummer are lower than surrounding sections in the Middle West owing to our elevation of several hundred feet above the general level. Springfield has an average of only 20 days each year with temperature rising to 90 or higher, whereas a larger number occurs in neighboring States even as far north as Omaha and Des Moines. And Springfield has had temperature up to 100 only 14 times in its 40 years' weather history. From April to November, inclusive, the climate is ideal for outdoor activities.

WINTERS NOT SEVERE

On the other hand, the winters are not severe as a general rule. During an average winter the temperature drops to freezing or lower on 85 days and to zero or lower on only 3 days. Twelve of the last 40 winters passed, however, without any zero weather.

Springfield has an average yearly snowfall of 18 inches, varying from none at all in the months of May to September, inclusive, to less than 6 inches in February. The total number of days each year with measurable snowfall is only 14, unless the year is abnormal.

The average annual rainfall is 41.79 inches, varying from 2.07 inches in February to 5.07 in May. Destructive droughts are rare and ground moisture is usually abundant. The average year has measurable rain on 114 days, and dense fog on 8 days, cloudy weather 90 days, party cloudy 105 days, and clear weather on 170 days. It will be seen that nearly half of the days are clear.

The following interview by Dr. Jeri V. Danes, professor in Charles University, Prague, Czechoslovakia, appeared in the Springfield Leader March 22, 1928, relative to the cave family in the Ozarks:

That the Ozark cave region comprises one of the most interesting Karst areas in the world is the opinion of Dr. Jeri V. Danes, professor in Charles University, Prague, Czechoslovakia and world authority on Karst phenomena. Doctor and Mrs. Danes, with Prof. and Mrs. D. S. Libbey, of Drury College, and other members of the Drury College faculty and a group of geology students visited Fairy and Marvel Caves in Stone County.

"Fairy Cave is one of the most interesting caves I have ever seen. It is a wonderful illustration of cave phenomena because it has compassed into a small area all the beauties of cave formation," Doctor Danes said. "It is very seldom that we find so many problems of the cave phenomena in so small an area."

SHATTERED BY QUAKE

"Marvel Cave is extremely interesting because of the magnitude of the huge cathedral room and the vertical distance from the entrance to the floor." Doctor Danes expressed his sincere thanks for having been brought to see the region, and said that he felt the trip had been of great value to him.

The formation of Fairy Cave was due, Doctor Danes said, to an enlarged crevasse, worn away with the seepage of water, or with an original river. There was more chemical than mechanical action in the formation, he believes. At one place the stalactites have been shattered; this was due to a comparatively recent earthquake. There are no other signs of disturbance, although the cave is older than the valley beside it, the expert believes.

The musical rocks in Fairy Cave, upon which Waldo Powell, proprietor of the cave played a series of musical selections, including imitations of a Salvation Army drum, a Chinese pong pong, cathedral chimes, and Indian tom-tom, are very fine specimens, according to Doctor Danes.

STREAMS UPHELD THEORY

Professor Libbey's party made a cursory examination of Marvel Cave and Doctor Danes said he had not made a thorough enough investigation to advance any positive theories concerning the formation of the cave. Professor Libbey, however, has determined to take up a study of the formation of the cathedral room this spring. He does not share the popular theory that the room was formed from a seepage of water at the top, but feels that mechanical action played a greater part than chemical action in the hollowing of the place. Probably, he said, the beginning was the same as that of Fairy Cave, but he thinks that millions of years ago the water level was as high as the top of the cave and the hard fragments wore out the room. The subterranean streams bear out his theory, he feels. There have been a great number of theories advanced concerning the formation, the most popular one being that of seepage from the top.

A FREAK OF CAVE PHENOMENA

The interesting helical formation in both caves are just chance happenings, Mr. Libbey said. They may have been influenced slightly by air currents but the spiral formation of the stalactites is largely a freak of cave phenomena.

CONTESTED ELECTION CASE—TAYLOR AGAINST ENGLAND

Mr. GIFFORD, chairman of the Committee on Elections No. 3, presented a report of that committee on the contested-election case of J. Alfred Taylor against E. T. England, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed.

ADDRESS OF HON. CARROLL L. BEEDY

Mr. SWING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting a speech by my colleague, Mr. CARROLL L. BEEDY, of Maine, to the Republican State convention in that State on March 29, 1928.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California.

There was no objection.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech:

THE RECORD OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY

Republicans of Maine are again met in convention to take counsel among themselves as to those principles upon which they shall stand in the coming election. It is, indeed, an honor to preside at this meeting of notable men and women. It is well for this Nation that in presidential years it looks to the Pine Tree State for an example of clear thinking and for guidance in sound action. So long as Maine records her verdicts in the early September elections, so long shall the psychological effect upon the entire country make for the safety and perpetuity of our institutions. The whole Nation is coming more and more to recognize that in Maine we are not carried away in thoughtless abandonment by the whims of the demagogue or the isms of the agitator. Even as our rugged headlands withstand the ravages of ocean storm, so will the men and women of Maine resist the fatuous proposals of political opportunists who urge radical remedies at the sacrifice of sound principle.

Two years ago we met in convention and adopted a platform upon which was elected a Republican State administration which has so functioned that the Democratic Party in Maine finds itself without a local issue in the coming campaign.

And what of the National Democratic Party? In 1923 that party apparently abandoned all attempts either to formulate or follow constructive principles, shut itself up in a committee room, and began an investigation of oil scandals. It then made and now makes no tenable objection to the Republican administration of the Nation's business. Four years have elapsed and the Democratic leaders have not yet emerged from the subterranean channels of investigation. They are still in committee—they are still exploring rat holes.

And what have been the actual results of the investigations? They disclose the details of an iniquitous and reprehensible betrayal of public trust by certain individuals. The wrongs disclosed were committed six and eight years ago. They disclose no evil of the present administration. They are wrongs of which no one approves but which every good citizen condemns. The disclosures in no way touch the great principles of government for which the Republican Party stands. They in no way affect the standards of honesty in public life to which the Republican Party subscribes. They do not soil even the garment hem of our Republican President, Calvin Coolidge. They reveal an age-worn truth that despite the keenest vigilance, unworthy individuals will seek shelter under the wing of an organization whose rank and file are adherents of truth, decency, and honesty. They disclose the lamentable fact that in individual instances greed and self-seeking overcome honesty and dethrone decency.

No man will contend that these investigations constitute an impeachment of the Republican Party itself. Indeed, Senator ROBINSON of Indiana rose in the Senate on Saturday last (March 24) and called attention to the fact that although Mr. Doheny testified under oath before the Senate Committee on Public Lands on December 3, 1923, that he contributed $75,000 to the Democratic campaign fund in 1920, yet the records of the Clerk of the House of Representatives show that the Democratic National Committee made a return of only $9,800 as Mr. Doheny's contribution. He further called attention to the fact that five of the Cabinet members of the Wilson administration, including the President's son-in-law, Mr. McAdoo, who received $250,000 of Mr. Doheny's money, have all been employed by Mr. Sinclair. Finally, the Senator from Indiana made this significant assertion: "Oil will not be an issue next November, in my judgment." With that statement we are in full accord.

The Democratic investigations have afforded no solution for the great problems of our Government. They have evolved no cardinal principles helpful in the advancement and betterment of the American people. They have been inspired by men ambitious for leadership. These men, under the slogan of "honesty in government," have emphasized and reemphasized individual cases of dishonesty. They raised the cry of Republican corruption and sought to destroy confidence in the Republican administration. Such men are, in effect, so inflaming the public mind as to create an unreasoned dissatisfaction by the masses with existing conditions. Their activities have lent aid to those who would tear down the existing structure of government and build anew upon the tenets of the socialist and the bolshevik.

Amidst the murky fogs of these prolonged investigations the record of the Republican Party reads clear. That record is an open book in which we take just pride. Our party is not entitled to the entire credit for the growth and development of this Nation, yet its consistent stand for constructive statesmanship and sanity in legislation has rendered material aid to our national growth and prosperity.

In this hour of gross materialism, when the tide of self-centered individualism is rising, Republicans must stand together against the propaganda of the detractor and the agitator. What our country needs to-day as never before are leaders; men with clean hearts, clear heads, and steady hands. We need calm men; aye, perchance silent men. God grant that we may have abundant leadership which will approximate the high standards of humility, patience, and self-denial which characterized Abraham Lincoln. In his day, when the Union was indeed in the crucible, when corruption and disloyalty would have reached their unclean hands into the public purse and rent the very Constitution itself, the great war President did not cry aloud to the country about wrongdoers. He did not complain that disaffection had crept into his Cabinet. He asked for no investigations. He spurned the rôle of reformer. His sole concern, nevertheless, was for the welfare of the great majority. He aimed to save this Government in the interest of the whole people. To this end he labored persistently but never blatantly. Quiet, firm, uncomplaining of others, he skillfully guided the great ship of state through the dark storms of a long night and weighed her anchor in peaceful waters gilded by the dawn of a better day.

It remains for the great party of Lincoln to carry on in the fulfillment of our national destiny. We must build, not destroy. We must look forward, not backward. We must dwell not upon transient evil. Ours is the search for abiding truth. We visualize a definite future program and we measure our spoken word to-day by our accomplished act of yesterday. We stand for thrift in Government finance; for Federal taxation which, under the provisions of a Federal income and estate tax, lifts the burden from the many and imposes it upon the opulent few. We stand unequivocally for a protective tariff. We stand for a strong Navy and an American merchant marine. We stand for prohibition and prohibition enforcement, State and national. We believe in the right of women equal with that of men—to vote and to participate in the great business of government. We believe in an uncompromising policy of restrictive immigration. We pledge ourselves to a course of unyielding resistance against any attempts to pervert the structure of this Government either by loosely drawn constitutional amendments or by usurpation of unconstitutional power. Finally we hold it to be an imperative duty of every party and every public servant to spurn the affluent individual or powerful organization which would corrupt the administration of government in the interest of privilege as against common right. Let it be understood once and for all that the Republican Party sponsors none who would corrupt or be corrupted with wealth. We would have naught of them nor of their ill-gotten gains.

The recent administration of the National Government by the Republican Party discloses a record which is businesslike, conservative, constructive. It has catered to no faction; it has favored no class; it has pursued an undeviating course with an eye single to the well-being of the entire Nation.

Realizing the prime necessity of maintaining a stable currency and a sound national credit, the Republican administration has lost no opportunity to reduce Government expenditures and to guard against unwise legislation. Federal revenues have exceeded disbursements every year since the Republicans took control of the Government in 1921. The total surplus for the seven fiscal years under a Republican administration has been two and one-half billions of dollars.

Under our direction and control the national debt has been reduced from $23,976,000,000 in 1921 to $17,950,000,000 in 1928, a total aggregate reduction of $6,026,000,000. Thus there has accrued to our people an annual interest saving of $201,691,000. In other words, when our party took over the Government, the people of the United States were paying an interest charge in round numbers of $19,000,000 per week. To-day that interest charge aggregates but $14,000,000 per week. This tremendous interest saving has been made possible not only by the reduction of the principal of our national debt but by the shrewd refunding operations of the Treasury Department, all of which has resulted in a saving to our people of $5,000,000 every week in interest charges alone.

Yet another saving under the Republican administration! During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, it took $6,141,000,000 to meet the expenses of the Government. This last fiscal year it took but $3,493,000,000, a saving of $2,648,000,000 in the year's operating expenses. As the result of careful administration under Republican rule it cost our people $51,000,000 less each week to run the Government in the fiscal year of 1927 than it cost in the fiscal year of 1921. Add this weekly saving in operating costs to the weekly saving in interest charges and we find that under Republican rule a saving of nearly $3,000,000,000 for the year, or $56,000,000 per week, has accrued to the American people in the cost of their Government. We submit this record of economy and business prudence in gross with the unhesitating assertion that it has never been paralleled in the political history of the world.

While accomplishing these savings, however, we pursued a policy of increasing liberality toward those who hazarded their all in the World War. Since 1921 we have more than doubled annual expenditures in behalf of World War veterans. As against $235,000,000 spent in 1921 we shall expend in the fiscal year of 1928 the enormous total of $582,000,000 or more than $11,000,000 per week for our World War veterans. A few days since the House Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation voted to report favorably a bill carrying $15,000,000 for the immediate remodeling and new construction of veterans' hospitals. All this money is well expended. A nation with the resources of the United States should pursue a liberal policy in the care and protection of those men who took up arms in an hour of national need.

A great portion of reductions in the expense of government has been reflected in three tax-reduction measures, a fourth of which is now pending before the Senate and will unquestionably become a law before the adjournment of this Republican Congress. Thus will have been consummated a tax-reduction program totalling $1,825,000,000.

I beg to direct your further attention to the fact that the present income tax law has been so amended that 98 per cent of our population, or one hundred and seventeen and a half millions of our people are absolutely exempt from a direct Federal tax. The present income tax law yields an annual total of two and one-quarter billions of dollars. Of that amount nearly two-thirds is paid by corporations. Individuals alone pay an income tax of but three-quarters of a billion dollars per annum. Of this amount 90 per cent is paid by 125,000 with incomes of $20,000 or more per annum. Thus in practice do Republicans of to-day, the political heir of those immortal Republicans of the sixties, give testimony that the Union which they saved—the Union of, by, and for the people—still endures.

Through the years our party has been true to certain great principles advocated by its founder when he was a candidate for election to the Illinois Legislature. Lincoln's platform read, "I believe in a system of internal improvements. I believe in a protective tariff. I am for the freedom of every human creature." He, therefore, stood for a protective tariff in 1854. The Republican Party stands for a protective tariff to-day; it stands for a tariff wall high enough to exclude from the American market competing products of foreign nations whose whole industrial life is built upon the conception that labor is adequately compensated at from 10 cents to $1 per day. Such a conception of the dignity and worth of labor the Republican Party never did and never will accept.

It is our opinion that the question of adequate protection to American labor and industry by the imposition of proper tariff duties will be the paramount issue in the coming campaign. On the 16th day of January last the Democratic Party in the Senate, aided by a radical and copperhead vote of the Northwest, passed the so-called McMaster resolution which called for an immediate downward revision of the tariff. Under the Constitution, all tariff legislation must originate in the House, and that body, being safely Republican, ignored the McMaster resolution. Frequently of late Democratic leaders have upbraided the Republicans of the House for their failure to heed the resolution of the Senate and revise the tariff downward. Indeed, the Democratic leaders have become so desperate in their search for an issue, that they have been driven to the absurd position of recommending a downward revision of the tariff for the benefit of the farmers.

But behold the situation which confronts them! Under the present tariff, agricultural implements, including plows, harrows, harvesters, reapers, mowers, horse rakes, cultivators, and threshing machines, are all on the free list. Potash, bone ash, and fertilizer of all kinds are admitted free. Raw jute, sisal, and binding twine, so essential in harvesting, together with barbed wire, lumber, shingles, and hundreds of other commodities used by farmers are on the free list. On the other hand, the American farmer is protected against the competition of cheap labor by a duty on wool, barley, buckwheat, corn, oats, rye, wheat, hay, milk, cream, butter, eggs, potatoes, and poultry, together with numerous other dairy products and vegetables. At the coming elections, if the House and Senate are safely Republican, we shall undoubtedly revise the tariff. In such case, however, it is the contention of Republicans that a tariff revision in the interest of the farmers should be upward, not downward.

Republicans do not lose sight of the fact that between 90 and 95 per cent of American farm products are consumed in the home market. Who constitute the major part of this great body of consumers in the home market? Who but the laborers employed by the millions in tariff-maintained industries! If the Democrats were to cut down the tariff schedules on manufactured products, the great industrial fabric of the Nation would be the first to suffer. Industry after industry must then either curtail or absolutely cease operations. Thus labor is displaced—the purchasing power of the masses is diminished, and the farmers' home market is demoralized. Every 100 per cent Republican knows these to be the undisputed facts. Even occasional Democrats now concede their truth and appear before the Ways and Means Committee seeking protective duties for home industries.

Under Republican rule it has been conclusively demonstrated to the thinking majority that a protective duty sufficient to meet the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad has so stimulated our industries that American labor now enjoys a greater purchasing power and a higher standard of living than in any other nation.

If intelligent investigation reveals the necessity of more protection and an increased price for farm products, Republicans will give that protection. The American people should be willing to pay enough for farm products to yield fair returns to agriculture. But to permit Democratic tinkering with and a general lowering of tariff duties, would not alone ruin agriculture, it would strike a blow at industry in general from which it would not recover in a decade.

Preserve our home markets? Protect our labor and our industry? Always! Lower our tariff walls? Sacrifice our own industries and permit an influx of cheap foreign goods on the plea of lower prices? Never! When American labor is unemployed and without money to buy, the farmer is unable to sell his products and in such case it is of little interest to him that English worsteds and German cutlery will be placed on sale in the local market at a low price. If, with manufacturing paralyzed and agriculture prostrate, our people are unable to buy, who cares about low-priced goods? Assume, however, that we could draw upon our savings and buy cheap foreign-made goods for a time. What would result? Foreign labor would for a time be fully employed; foreign merchants and manufacturers would soon have our savings. When, however, we make our own worsteds, cutlery, and what not, we can sell in our own markets, for our labor is then employed and can buy the products of both factory and farm. Then it is that our money and our goods are both in the hands of our own people, manufacturing is revived and agriculture is stimulated.

But, say the Democrats, with a high tariff wall around our borders, we shall be forced to deal only among ourselves. Commercial intercourse with foreign lands will wane and we shall ultimately become a hermit Nation. In 1922, prominent Democrats in the House of Representatives warned us that high duties would ruin our foreign trade. What has developed? Since we passed the Fordney-McCumber Tariff in 1922, our total annual exports have steadily increased in volume until in 1927 they exceeded our exports in 1922 by more than a billion dollars, attaining in fact a gigantic total of nearly $5,000,000,000. Meanwhile in this same period, 50 per cent of our imports have been admitted duty free, while the revenues collected on dutiable imports have aggregated nearly $3,000,000,000, and by so much have obviated the necessity of direct Federal tax upon the American people.

The more closely we analyze the situation the more clearly we perceive that fundamental differences between Republicans and Democrats of to-day are essentially economic. Facts justify the Republicans. A system of protective duties on foreign goods which compete with American products never has and never will terminate our trade relations with other nations. Every tendency is in the opposite direction. The world both by necessity and invention "has become indissolubly bound together in the processes of earning its daily bread, and these processes affect the life and well-being of the masses of every nation."

To-day America is the leading financial and industrial nation of the world. Her vast loans abroad, together with her need of raw products from the uttermost corners of the globe, coupled with the dependence of other lands upon our varied resources, link her indissolubly with the economic and social life of all nations.

Picture for a moment this vast country whose foreign trade last year totaled nearly $9,000,000,000; picture her four and one-half billions of merchandise destined annually for foreign shores; visualize her constantly expanding foreign trade and the ever-increasing necessity for the disposal of her surplus abroad. Picture such a situation in such a nation, and then stand aghast when I tell you that she has no American delivery wagons with which to serve her customers abroad. To-day as never before the United States needs an American merchant marine. In the early days of April next a Republican Committee of the House on Merchant Marine, headed by an eminent Republican from Maine, will report to the National Congress a bill which carries greater aid to American shipping than has been written into law for three-quarters of a century. For an American-built and an American-manned merchant marine, the Republican Party stands unequivocally committed.

Bear in mind, too, that with the development of our own merchant marine and the expansion of trade relations incident thereto comes an added need for the extension of our banking facilities in foreign lands, perchance for the erection of storage plants and for the leasing or owning of wharfage rights, all of which bring an added intricacy of international relations.

Trade rivalries are thus intensified. Possibilities of misunderstandings are thus increased. It is inevitable that if we are to pursue our present policy in the Far East, where lie the great possibilities for future trade, we must be prepared equally with other nations in proportion to our needs to protect our commerce on the seas as well as the lives and properties of our nationals at home and abroad. To this end an adequate navy, complemented by an auxiliary fleet of merchant cruisers, becomes a crying necessity. Our choice is clear. Either we must abandon our competition for world trade and limit both industrial and agricultural development to the needs of our own population and that of a limited foreign trade or we must build our merchant marine and strengthen our Navy.

Political wisdom, however, and the Christian faith itself gives promise that men, under whatever circumstance, of whatever color or tongue, are created in the image of their Maker, and, though they dwell in national areas separated by physical boundaries, yet their fundamental interests are common and they are designed to live in peace and understanding.

There is a well-founded and constantly growing sentiment in this country that war is an unjustifiable method for the settlement of international disputes. This is the sentiment of many who are by no means pacifists. They are God-fearing, liberty-loving men and women. They believe that every effort should be made to outlaw war as an international crime. In recognition of this sentiment the Limitation of Armament Conference was convoked under the auspices of the Republican Party in 1921 and 1922. That conference was a great stride for sanity in international relations.

In the summer of 1927 a conference at Geneva inspired by this country failed through no fault of the present administration. In 1932, in accordance with the treaty signed at Washington in 1922, the nations concerned will again meet to consider a more comprehensive program of international disarmament. It is the hope of all that the high purpose of that conference will be fully realized. It is our hope also that yet other conferences similarly purposed will ensue and that ultimately nations will be moved in the light of history and their own experience to provide armaments not for international conflicts but solely for the purpose of dealing with that comparatively small portion of the human race which is hopelessly recalcitrant and unmindful of its obligations before God and man. Pending such "consummation devoutly to be wished," we must pursue the prudent course, acting in the interests not alone of international peace but of the safety and security of our own people and the national domain.

Our party will oppose any attempts to break down the present restrictive immigration law. We placed this law upon the statute books and there we propose to keep it. Changes, if they come, must buttress but not debilitate it. We hold it now to be self-evident that America must be kept American.

We pride ourselves that the Republican Party elevated women to their rightful station in a Government designed to be administered by its own people. In the light of experience we make no apology for this right thus conferred. The influence of womankind has made for good throughout all history. It is unquestionably true that the sphere of womanhood is primarily in the home, but we believe that women, like the Bible, are of use not only in the home, but in Government. Our Bible reads, "Thou hast been faithful over a few things I will make thee ruler over many things." We have applied our Bible in politics. We have vested full political rights in American womanhood. For her we have opened wide the door of added opportunity, confident that she will wield the same wholesome influence in Government which she has wielded in the home.

The Republican Party in Maine believes the unrestrained sale of intoxicants to be an evil. Prohibition was lately adopted by nations in war on the ground that intoxicants impaired the morale and efficiency of their people. If this be true in war, it is equally true in peace. No government should compromise with an evil. The United States has taken a positive stand. It has written prohibition into the Constitution and made it the supreme law. Those who would violate or condone the violation of a law thus enacted invite disaster and encourage anarchy. Believing in the fundamental justification for prohibition, we stand for an unconditional compliance with its terms in letter and in spirit. This indeed is but the standard of decency in citizenship.

Ladies and gentlemen, such in chief are the principles upon which stand the Republican men and women of Maine. We submit that these principles pass the high test of good morals and good business in government. We invite their consideration and support by all who value the blessings of free government and sense the necessity of its proper direction and control.

Mindful of the inevitable diversity of viewpoint on questions of public policy, we urge upon all the avoidance of perils incident to factional and group division on issues of secondary importance. It is our hope that the two dominant parties in our present-day America may long preserve their militant identity. Divided on fundamental political principles, may they be united ever in common purpose to build for future generations a happy, a moral, and an enduring nation.

ADDRESS OF HON. CHARLES B. TIMBERLAKE

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating an address delivered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TIMBERLAKE] at Denver, Colo.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Speaker, I submit herewith, to be printed in the RECORD, an address delivered by Hon. CHARLES B. TIMBERLAKE, of Colorado, at the Western Tariff Congress, held in Denver, Colo., a most interesting and illuminating discussion of the intricacies and difficulties of tariff revision. Mr. TIMBERLAKE, a leading Member of the House for 14 years and a member of the Ways and Means Committee for 9 years, a period including the turbulent tariff revision days of 1921 and 1922, has rendered invaluable service to the western agricultural and mining sections of the country in his insistence upon their rights and his clear and unprejudiced understanding of the complexities and magnitude of the problem of protection. The address is of particular interest just at this time when the tariff issue is again before Congress and the people, and a readjustment of schedules to give adequate protection to agriculture is a phase of the farm problem which can no longer be overlooked nor denied.

The address is as follows:

TARIFF REVISION

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I have the great honor to be a member of the Ways and Means Committee of the Congress of the United States which prepared the present tariff law. I have no set speech to make to this congress, but it has been suggested by the chairman and several others that I tell something of the facts surrounding the preparation of this measure, that it may be of interest to all of us to ascertain just how it was that the present rates in the tariff law were agreed to.

It is a big job to rewrite a tariff bill. The present law contained more than 17,000 individual items, and each one of those items must be given the attention of the members of the committee who are responsible for that schedule. In order that the full committee may be employed, it is the practice to divide up the membership of that committee into subcommittees of at least three, having in charge special schedules. I was a member of the subcommittee preparing the schedule on the products of the mines—metals and minerals—and coming from the State of Colorado, a State vitally interested in these matters, I deemed it a great privilege to have an opportunity to pass upon the rates that it was possible for the committee to secure in order to determine what would be a proper protective rates upon these products.

Before we began this work, however, as you all know, general hearings were held, at which all those interested were notified they would have an opportunity to appear before the committee and give them any and all information which they might be able to give regarding the necessity for protection upon their various industries. These hearings occupied more than six weeks. Every opportunity was given them to appear and be heard. Many appeared, and when it was apparent or evident that there were no longer any applicants to be heard, these hearings were closed, and we started with the consideration of the bill. I will say, however, that this was not an ironclad rule, and the fact that the hearings had been closed did not prevent people who were interested from coming before the membership of these subcommittees and presenting their applications for rates of protection upon their industries. So that while these subcommittees were engaged for more than four months in preparing the rates on these products, during all that time, except during the last 10 days, when it was absolutely necessary for the full committee to meet and go over carefully the reports of the various subcommittees and agree upon the rates submitted, the committee was open for these hearings. During the last 10 days, however, we gave notice that no further hearings would be held. Even that was not an ironclad rule, for I think there are parties here to-day who had not an opportunity prior to that time to present their claim and who were accorded the privilege even after that date.

It was a most difficult matter at that time to determine what rates would be protective on the various industries of this country. Because of the serious condition throughout the world by reason of the World War we had to secure information on and take into consideration many factors and in many countries. We had to secure information on what the cost was to produce an article in Germany, Italy, France, England. As an advocate of protection I was not willing to agree upon a rate which I did not believe would represent the difference in the cost of production of these articles here and abroad. That is as far as I am ever willing to go in the preparation of a tariff bill. It was a difficult matter to ascertain these costs, by reason of the depreciated value of currency in the various countries. In England the pound had depreciated; not, of course, to the extent the German mark had, but had depreciated, and not to the extent of the franc of France nor the lira of Italy. And so, not being permitted under the law to make one rate that was applicable to England, and another applicable to Germany and Italy, because our constitution prohibits our giving any favored nation an advantage over any other nation, you can see at once that it was a difficult problem indeed to say what would be a proper and fitting rate the world over. It required a higher rate to be a protective rate upon France than it did on England, and upon Italy, and again it depended upon conditions existing in countries where the currency had not depreciated like it had in others. Due to the fact that we could not sit there in the committee room and know what a proper rate would be without being properly advised by some authority, we appealed to and were helped materially by the Tariff Commission. I have only words of praise for the Tariff Commission of the United States. They were liberal enough in giving us information when requested, but never at any time did they suggest a rate which the committee should adopt. They regarded that as not the province of the commission, and we agreed with them in that, but it was the province of the commission, however, to give to the committee information it was necessary for us to have in order to enable us to make the proper rates. They had not been in operation long at that time and often were not prepared to furnish complete data, and in order to obtain information they had to send their experts into these different countries to ascertain the cost of labor and price paid for material in England, and the price paid for labor and material in France and Germany and the other nations, and the very hardest work was the determination from all the data obtained what a reasonable and protective rate should be. To determine the cost here the committee required all applicants for protection for their industries to furnish the committee sworn statements as to the cost of manufacture here.

Now, as a member of the Ways and Means Committee, I was very strongly in favor of basing the tariff upon the American valuation. That was true, because I knew we could arrive at a rate which would bring protection, whereas if based on foreign valuation the rate that would be protective against England would not be protective against France, and the rate that would be protective against France would not be against Germany and Italy and the other nations, and I felt that the only way to arrive at a rate that would give just protection to the industries here was to base that rate upon the American valuation, and I want to say right here that in the preparation of that bill the only opposition that came to that committee was from the importers of this country. They opposed it because they were interested in getting goods shipped into this country at as cheap a rate as possible so that they could have a larger amount of profits in the goods which they imported to compete with our homemade goods. But this opinion was not agreed to by the Senate, and in consequence was not adopted. The provision was adopted that if a rate was found to be too small, under the flexible provision or clause of the tariff act the President was given the authority to raise that rate. As suggested by Mr. Hagenbarth here this morning—and I believe his statement was true—there was not a thought in the minds of the Members of the House and Senate that if the prerogative of the President should be used it would not be used in any case to lower the rate; but, on account of conditions existing in this country and in other countries where it had been found impossible to determine just what would be a protective rate, it was thought that we should under the terms of the flexible provision of the tariff law have authority, upon the recommendation of the Tariff Commission, to raise these rates should they be found inexpedient to meet the requirements as to full protection.

I recognize, as we all do, that to have the tariff question continually agitated and at different times coming up affects business, and unless there is a settlement of that question business will not be as stable as it would be without it. I am free to state that with all the information I have, there was no fear upon the part of the Members of the Senate or the House that the flexible provision of the tariff act would be exercised by the Tariff Commission or the President in any way to reduce the rates established upon the farm products or the cattle, mineral, or wool interest of this country, because all Members of Congress were fully advised with reference to the necessity for these rates, and it was not thought that there would be any effort to lower these rates. We had full information before our committee regarding the necessity for a protective tariff in the South, because their able representative, Mr. Kirby, president of the Southern Tariff Association, was before our committee and gave us full information with reference to the serious conditions surrounding agriculture in that great country, and the necessity for protection for them.

We were not left in the dark with reference to the necessity for a protective tariff for agriculture, livestock, cattle, or any commodity or industry. Nor were we in the dark with reference to the necessity for a protective tariff required for the woolgrowers and wool industry, because the woolgrowers of Utah, Idaho, and any number of the others were before us and submitted data to show us the cost of production here, and then we had before us the cost of production in Australia and other countries which produced wool. Of course, there was a disagreement upon the part of some of the members of the committee, interested, of course, in the manufacturing industries, and we had objection from them to the rate which was agreed upon. I can not understand the necessity for a hearing or examination to determine whether or not it was necessary to reduce these rates. I feel that it was a wise clause, simply because of the things I have related. I was not in favor of it in the beginning, but I saw where it might redound to our interest.

We are all selfish regarding the tariff. I can't explain that, perhaps, without giving some of the inside information, but I have censured them in public for the position which they took. That was the representatives of the Eastern States, interested especially in the manufacturing business. They were most insistent upon securing a proper rate of protection upon the articles which they manufactured. I went with them just as far as I thought necessary, believing and hoping that they would take a broad view when it came to granting to the West and the agricultural interests the same protection they asked for their interests. I regret to say, however, that after they had obtained favorable consideration from the committee in granting to them their protection we found them objecting when we asked for protection on the products of the farm and on the products of the cattle industry and of the wool industry and of the mines. No stronger evidence would be required than that some of them voted against the emergency bill when it came up for consideration. Some of them so far failed to take a broad view of this question that they even voted against the permanent tariff bill upon this proposition. But how much better, my friends, would it have been for them to pay a slight excess of cost for what their consumers ate and wore, rather than that they should be idle.

At the time they were operating under the Underwood bill, before the preparation of the present tariff measure, what was the condition of the consumers of these factories in the East? They were idle. More than 6,000 laborers were unemployed at that time because the factories were shutdown and there was no work for them to do. I thought surely if we gave them a tariff bill that would reopen their factories, make a market for their products, and they were put to work with a full shift of 12 to 24 hours, thus making it necessary to bring into productive employment all these idle men, surely they would be willing to allow these producers of the raw materials of the West a protective tariff and pay a few cents more, perhaps, for their raw materials in order that they might be profited in being thus employed, especially when that few cents more just made up to the producers of the West some of the benefits that these eastern manufacturers had reaped from the principle of protection during the ages and which had made them a prosperous portion of the United States. We had a hard time, gentlemen, to convince many of them of the justice of this contention.

With all that we were able to obtain for the products of the farms and the livestock and wool industries, the agricultural conditions are anything but favorable at this time. They need something to bring them out of the unfavorable condition now prevalent. The present administration, in my judgment, has done everything that sound logic will permit, yet the conditions obtain. Low prices still prevail. What can be done to lift them out of this dilemma? If any man or any group of men can conceive a sound and feasible plan by which their condition can be remedied, I know the spirit of the United States Congress and its Members, and I know that they will take up that proposition, and if it is sane and sound logic it will be enacted and relief will come.

Mr. Harding made the suggestion that we could not tell what the present condition is. It is confusion and chaos. I for one am firmly convinced that the chief cause of the troubles of the agricultural interests to-day are that just after and during the war we had and enjoyed prosperous times. We had had a great inflation in prices. everybody had and was spending money, and everybody was contracting additional obligations and making additional investments. It was easy to go to a local bank and secure a loan, and that condition was running rampant, until out of the clear sky in the summer of 1920, just when the crops had been matured and no part of them had been marketed, there came an order from the Federal reserve bank to its member banks to the effect that no further extension of time on loans would be granted; that the time for deflation had come and that they must call on their creditors to deflate and to pay their obligations to the local banks.

What was the result? The farmer had only just matured his crops. These crops had been raised on war-time rates of pay to labor and war-time prices for materials, and at the highest cost for labor ever known in American history. They were called upon to pay their local obligations, and the result was that they must hurl their crops into the open market, because they had no other means of paying their obligations. This caused the markets to break, and they were forced to sell their products for a price that was below the cost of production. What did it do to the cattle industry? The cattleman was called upon to liquidate his indebtedness to the local banker, and he had no means of paying except by marketing his cattle, and this flood of cattle upon the market—what effect, gentlemen, did this have? We all know. It could have none other than to glut the market and reduce the price to a point far below the cost of production. He had to sell because he had to pay, and when he sold at this loss it left him in a bad condition. All you cattlemen know the result. The Government has recognized this, and in its effort to aid has organized the War Finance Corporation to refinance the cattleman, which has been some relief. The Federal Farm Loan Board was given additional appropriations to further aid the farmers, and still the condition of agriculture in this country is not what it should be. I am gratified to know that under the present tariff the mining industries at last are showing great activity.

I don't want to further tire your patience, but I do want to say how pleased I am with the progress this organization has made and I am predicting that your deliberations here will be of much benefit to the great western country. I thank you.

LETTER OF JOHN T. ORR IN DEFENSE OF NATHAN ADAMS

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from John T. Orr, president of the Texas Farm Bureau Cotton Association with reference to remarks that I made on the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, in December last I made a speech in the House in which I offered some criticism of Nathan Adams because of a purported interview which was published in the Dallas News.

My colleague, Hon. HATTON W. SUMNERS, who represents the Dallas district, has received a communication from John T. Orr, president of the Texas Farm Bureau Cotton Association, in which he makes certain denials and comments both in regard to the alleged interview and in reference to work done by Mr. Adams in behalf of agriculture.

Every man is entitled to his day in court. Both sides of any matter should be heard. I think it but fair, therefore, that this explanation should be placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD of this date.

The letter is as follows:

COOPERATIVE COTTON MARKETING

TEXAS FARM BUREAU COTTON ASSOCIATION (INC.),
Dallas, Tex., March 15, 1928.

Hon. HATTON W. SUMNERS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR HATTON: There has recently been extensively circulated in Texas, under congressional frank, a speech of the Hon. MARVIN JONES, of Amarillo, delivered in the House of Representatives on Wednesday, December 7, 1927, wherein he attacks the reputation, intelligence, and sincerity of Nathan Adams, president of the American Exchange National Bank of Dallas.

I can take this occasion to remind you that Mr. Adams is a man of state-wide and national reputation for his understanding of and interest in the business and problems of the cotton farmer. As the president of the largest organization of cotton growers in the United States, and believing that I have some knowledge of the cotton farmers' problems myself, I distinctively resent, on behalf of the cotton farmers of this State, Mr. JONES's attack and denunciation of our good friend Mr. Adams. Were there any justification for such an assault there would be no occasion for this letter; but since the entire speech is based upon a statement which Mr. Adams did not make, and since a denial of it by him was given wide publicity, there was, in my judgment, no such justification.

What Mr. Adams really did say was that the danger to cotton farmers in the immediate future was that with cotton selling at more than 20 cents a pound they would consider cotton a more profitable crop than other crops, and, therefore, might increase their acreage and consequent yield to the point where they would themselves destroy their own future prosperity by reducing the total value of the crop. In consequence, he said, of increasing their cotton acreage they would reduce their acreage in food and feed crops, and therefore, with the small cash income from the sale of cotton, they would be required to purchase high-priced feed, and thereby injure themselves in both ways. Every successful farmer knows that this statement is sound and this advice is wise and constructive. The hope for good cotton prices is that the production of cotton should be kept within the limits of the world's needs, and that whatever we may grow of other products after we have supplied the world's need for cotton, simply adds to the total value of the products produced by the farmers during a given period. There is no difference of opinion among successful farmers and practical economists and constructive statesmen on this important point of agricultural practice.

An intimate business and personal acquaintance with Mr. Adams covering a period of over 30 years, during which time I have had no interest or business other than that of farming, qualifies me, I think, to know whether or not Mr. Adams is a real friend of the farmer. For your information I wish to recite a few of the outstanding achievements of Mr. Adams in aid of cotton farmers.

In the early part of October, 1914, at the time of the great slump in cotton, which began with the outbreak of the World War, Mr. Adams and Mrs. Joseph A. Kemp, of Wichita Falls, called a meeting of Texas bankers at Dallas and urged the adoption of a resolution expressing confidence in the value of cotton, which at that time was selling at 5 to 7 cents a pound, with the market totally demoralized. There was opposition to the resolution in the association of bankers but it prevailed by a majority of about 20 per cent. Mr. Adams was not content with that activity and he immediately called upon 30 conspicuous bankers in the State to join him in a signed statement in the form of a resolution expressing confidence in cotton and offering to lend money on it in generous volume and at low interest. Twenty-seven of the 30 bankers invited responded and the statement was issued. I think there is not a well-informed man in the State, or in the South, who does not recognize that action by Mr. Adams was responsible for an instant arrest of the panic in cotton and a substantial advance in the values.

In 1921 the cotton States' bankers undertook to set up the Federal International Banking Co. to extend long-time credit to foreign buyers of cotton. At that time cotton was in another slump on account of excess production following the deflation period, and Mr. Adams and T. J. Caldwell took the field in Texas and raised the quota required for the Federal International Banking Co. That service and that institution contributed materially to the recovery of prices.

In 1921 Mr. Eugene Meyer, as chairman of the War Finance Corporation, came to Texas and called upon bankers to assist in organizing finance corporations, particularly to save the cattle situation, and a great enterprise was set up in Fort Worth. Mr. Adams was conspicuous in raising the Dallas capital for that undertaking.

Late in 1925 Mr. Adams foresaw the disaster to follow from an excess production of cotton in 1926 and communicated with a considerable number of banking friends in the State in an endeavor to bring about an organized activity which would prevent or modify such a calamity. It was not until January 14, 1926, that he succeeded in assembling a sufficient number of bankers and other business men to warrant procedure, but on that date in Dallas a conference was held, as called by Mr. Adams, which was attended by about 40 or 50 bankers of the State, and the Texas Safe Farming Association was organized with the purpose of maintaining the activity for a period of five years in the hope of establishing a system of safe farming. The first step of that organization was to induce country bankers and country merchants to base credit in 1926 upon the planting of sufficient food and feed crops to maintain the farm, family, and establishment. Immediately following the organization Mr. Adams communicated by telegraph with about 25 or 30 of the leading bankers of the South and endeavored to bring about a Southwide activity to the same end, but unfortunately few other bankers were as farsighted as he, and no such action was taken as in Texas.

All well-informed men will agree that the Texas Safe Farming Association was chiefly responsible for the abundant food and feed crops produced in Texas in 1926 and 1927, and though this activity in a single State could not materially affect an acreage reduction in the entire South, it did save many farmers who otherwise would have incurred losses by planting more cotton. They lost money on the cotton they did plant, but they did not have to buy food and feed crops.

The same activity, in cooperation with the Texas Bankers' Association, waged a campaign in 1927 for reduced cotton acreage, and the office of the Texas Safe Farming Association was the central agency for the southwide movement that year, which reduced acreage about 12½ per cent.

Thus it may be fairly said that Mr. Adams was responsible for the agency which promoted recovery from the slump of 1926, and that if his advice had been taken by other southern bankers in 1926 there would have been no overproduction that year and no loss to cotton farmers.

I could state other instances, but these should be sufficient to show that Mr. Adams is the outstanding banker of the South in his comprehension of the economic factors in the production and marketing of cotton, and that his sympathies and energies have always been employed for the betterment of cotton farmers.

The time has about arrived when intelligent men on the farms, even if they have had a misconception of the solution of their problems and have been patient and long suffering, should be told the truth, however disagreeable it may be, rather than fed on empty words of loyalty and inaccurate statements, the belief in which gets them nowhere in working out their problems. The time has also come in American agriculture when our representatives should give intelligent and constructive service, in a legislative way, to a solution of economic questions involving agriculture rather than fulsome lip service, which obscures, if not prevents, an intelligent consideration of the farmers' great problems. In fact, the situation of the farmer has reached the point where he must determine who is his real friend. For years Mr. Adams, in his office and in public speeches, has appealed to the bankers and business men of Texas for a more helpful attitude toward the farmers. He has preached diversification. He has championed the cause of cooperative marketing, and has done so without any thought or possibility of advantage to himself. He has courageously fought the battles of producers, even when a more moderate course would have been much easier, and, temporarily at least, a greater benefit to the institution which he heads. His work last year as president of the Texas Safe Farming Association, if he had never done anything else in the interest of the farmers, would establish him as one of the outstanding friends of agriculture in Texas.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN T. ORR,
President Texas Farm Bureau Cotton Association.

In this connection I think it is proper to insert the original purported interview, together with Mr. Adams's denial of such interview, and which two articles are as follows:

BANKER WARNS AGAINST "FALSE PROSPERITY" IN WAKE OF HIGH COTTON

Thirty-cent cotton would be potentially disastrous to Texas, was the warning issued Tuesday by Nathan Adams, president of the American Exchange National Bank.

"While prosperity looms for the farmer, he must look to the future; and if he holds his cotton to get 30 cents a pound, he then will be making a big mistake," Mr. Adams declared.

"A higher price than 20 cents would cause a false wave of prosperity and end in a spending spree that would offset the profits made on the 1928 crop," he says. "The farmer would spend all his profits, if he has any after paying his 1926 debts, and would find it difficult to finance his 1928 crops," he pointed out.

"The 1927 crop of Texas will reach nearly 4,000,000 bales, it is predicted; and to sell at 20 cents would make a nice profit in which to pay off outstanding debts," Mr. Adams said. The farmer has borrowed less this year than in previous years, and his crop has cost less, which are two factors that will be in his favor.

"Texas is no place for pessimists, and they should get out as quickly as possible," Mr. Adams said.

SCORES COTTON MARKET ADVICE—CONFERENCE WILL RIGHT SITUATION, NATHAN ADAMS SAYS

Registering a protest against the action of the Government in "seeking to advise the agricultural interests when to sell and when not to sell," Nathan Adams, president of the American Exchange National Bank, Saturday said that the situation would right itself if confidence is held, and this is the time to show confidence while there is both money and credit to carry it through.

Mr. Adams said that he was recently misquoted in the News as opposing 30-cent cotton.

"I have refrained from denying the interview of some days ago in the Dallas News, in which one of your reporters stated that I am very much opposed to 30-cent cotton, and used other language in the interview wholly foreign to my thought," Mr. Adams said.

FAVORS FAIR RETURN

"It is a well-known fact throughout the State of Texas that my attitude has always been friendly to cotton—that I have always wanted to see the producers of this country receive a fair return for their labors. I would not at this time deny the interview except for the fact that I have had many letters from friends of mine over the State expressing amazement at my attitude. I thought the sane people of Texas would know that I could not have said the things attributed to me in this interview.

"I now want to publicly enter my protest against the action of the Government of the United States in seeking to advise the agricultural interests of this country when to sell and when not to sell. If I understand anything about the functioning of the Agricultural Department of the Government, it is for the purpose of giving plain facts and that is as far as any Government agency should go, or seek to control the business of this country.

"The estimate of the Agricultural Department as to the volume of this year's crop is in direct contradiction to the published statement of the value of cotton and its need at this time. The figures of a 7,000,000-bale carry-over include 3,000,000 to 4,000,000 bales of very low-grade cotton. It must be apparent that a 4,000,000-bale carry-over is nothing more than insurance against a very short crop, which may occur under present conditions any year.

HAVE MONEY AND CREDIT

"The farmers of this State should not be stampeded by the action of the Government. The Federal reserve bank and the credit of Texas is behind cotton, and there is no reason for them to force the sale of cotton immediately after the pronouncement of the Agricultural Department.

"It will right itself if confidence is held supreme, and this is the time to show our confidence when we have both the money and the credit to carry it through.

"The cotton of this country is a part, and a very wonderful part, of its welfare. It is the protection of the gold reserve of this country, and at the present time 45 to 47 per cent of it seeks a market in foreign countries, and certainly no Government official has the right to dictate when it should be sold."

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, the following leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. PEERY (at the request of Mr. BLAND of Virginia), indefinitely, on account of illness in family.

To Mr. LOZIER (at the request of Mr. CANNON), for three days, on account of illness.

PARK POLICE OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that general debate on the bill may be concluded in one hour, one-half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. Is there objection?

Mr. EDWARDS. Reserving the right to object, if this request is not granted, what will be the result?

Mr. BLANTON. The result will be that general debate will extend for two hours or more.

Mr. EDWARDS. I will not object, for I want to get at the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. ZIHLMAN was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LAGUARDIA in the chair.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Texas occupy his time, for I do not care to occupy mine.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, until very recently I have been under the impression that the park police force should be consolidated with the Capital police force, so that there should be but one police department in the District of Columbia; but from developments that have occurred and from investigations that have been made by our District Committee I have come to a conclusion that has made me change my position diametrically on that subject. I believe that the park police force is the only real safeguard, the only real dependable police guard that the people of the United States have here in this Capital. We should never consolidate it. For the Metropolitan police is controlled not by Congress but by the Commissioners of the District.

I asked the District Committee to lay the bill aside that I had before it, and which at one time last session it was voted out unanimously. I have asked the committee to lay it aside and kill it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to say that in Baltimore we have a park police and a metropolitan police. The park police comes under the park board and the metropolitan police comes under the State.

Mr. BLANTON. There is a different reason for keeping the park police force intact. The park police is the United States force, and it is controlled absolutely by the United States Government. It is responsible alone to the United States Government. It is the people's only dependable protection here in this city in case certain emergencies should arise.

The longer I stay here in Washington and the more I study our Constitution the more I am impressed with the fact that our forefathers were men of great wisdom when they wrote that Constitution. They were farsighted men. They looked far into the future. They knew what was good for the people of this Nation. Do not you ever agree to obliterate your park police. Keep it intact.

I have come to the conclusion that it is absolutely necessary to have a White House police separate and distinct and intact. I have come to the conclusion that it is a good thing to have a Capitol police that is responsible to the Congress only for the protection of the people's Capitol Building. Never again will I make a proposal to consolidate the forces. There is something more important than economy and that is the dependable protection of the people and the people's property of this Government. Therefore I am in favor of this bill and I want to see it passed.

I want to see an adequate salary paid the park policemen, commensurate with the other policemen. If we had a force of Metropolitan police, all of whom were honest and dependable, I would be in favor of raising their salaries; but until we clean them up I ask you men not to raise their salaries one dollar.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Will the gentleman tell us how to "clean them up?"

Mr. BLANTON. I shall do that later, not in these 30 minutes. Let me tell you what happened. Last fall I went to a number of men both in the House and the Senate and asked them what would be a proper raise for the policemen. All of them agreed that it should not be over $300. I was told by a Senator who is very active on such matters that if a bill ever went to the Senate carrying over $300 he was going to do his best to kill it.

I thought then and I still believe that the great majority of our 1,348 policemen here are honest men who want to do the right thing and would do the right thing if they could, but there is an awful rottenness at the head of the department that must be cleaned up, for it demoralizes the whole force. As soon as this Congress met, believing that practically all of the force were honest and deserving men, I introduced a bill to pay them a raise of $300. I found that that met with the approval of a great many men in the House and the Senate. That bill went before the committee, and to my surprise the superintendent of the police sent his main adjutant, Inspector Pratt, and the fire department came in the person of its chief, Mr. Watson, and they asked that they should have a $1,000 raise each and that subordinate officers should have raises in proportion. We told them distinctly that if they insisted on such a bill it would mean no raise for any of them. They got the chairman of the committee [Mr. ZIHLMAN] to introduce their bill for them giving them thousand-dollar raises and on down in proportion. When that bill came up in committee we told them that if they asked for more than $300 they would never get it passed, but they insisted and the bill was reported out granting them $500 raises and from that on down. That bill was reported here to this House and is on the calendar. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] asked the chairman of the committee when that bill was going to be called up. I will tell him. It will not be called up at all. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. MARTIN B. MADDEN, of Illinois, who protects the people's Treasury, said that that bill shall not pass. The leaders here in this House said that it shall not pass, and the leaders in the Senate have said that it shall not pass. My friend from Wisconsin will find that it will die here in a pigeonhole in this Congress and will not became a law. They have been too greedy, they have asked for too much. Does that answer my friend?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. I do not agree that any set of leaders in this Congress controls 435 Representatives of the people, and I have hopes that in the future——

Mr. BLANTON. Wait; I want to answer the first part of that statement, and I do not yield any further. When the gentleman has been here as long as I have been he will find out that the leaders of this Congress do run the Congress. If he has not found that out yet, he has not learned his first lesson. The leaders of the Congress do control the other 400 men. Whatever the leaders on this side and the leaders on my side say is done here in the House of Representatives, and you will never override them if you stay here a hundred years. [Laughter.]

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Provided they are right.

Mr. BLANTON. And they run things whether they are right or wrong, and they are going to continue to run things whether they are right or wrong. They are wrong most of the time, but they run things just the same. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHAFER. Are they wrong in the policemen's salary increase bill? I see that the gentleman from Texas is with them now.

Mr. BLANTON. I am with them against these high raises, when some crooked policemen will get it.

Mr. SCHAFER. Let us bring the bill on the floor and make it a flat $300 raise all through.

Mr. BLANTON. They are not going to permit that bill now to come up. Whenever the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] and the distinguished Speaker, from Ohio, who was nominated recently for the Presidency by my friend from Wisconsin, tell the chairman of the District of Columbia that he can not do anything, he does not do it, because he obeys orders. He would not be the chairman if he did not. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHAFER. I suggest, if the gentleman will yield, and the gentleman really is in favor of raising the salaries of policemen, that he should not give aid and comfort to a certain clique that he says controls legislation here and the 435 Representatives of the people.

Mr. BLANTON. There are about 150 of the rottenest policemen on God's earth in this department. Of the 1,348, there are at least 150 who are rotten to the core. I shall never agree to vote a single dollar of increased salary to one of them until they clean that department up and get the rottenness out of it. These 150 rotten policemen should be fired. Then I shall help them get their salary raises; but I am against any raise in salary going to a department that is rotten from the top down to the extent of at least 150 policemen. They have cut themselves off from their own clabber, so to speak. They have cut themselves off from their own raise by asking for too much and on having and harboring rottenness in their department.

I say this about my friend Colonel Grant. I am with Colonel Grant. He is an honest man and a splendid official. I have watched him here, and I have checked up his department, and he is as straight as a die.

I am with him in all his honest endeavors to protect this Capital for the people. I want to say to him that I am going to help him with his park police. I am going to help him maintain them intact. I am going to be with him all the way down the line. He can depend upon me as one member of the District Committee to help him to carry out every single one of his ambitions to make this the greatest Capital in existence. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas reserves the balance of his time.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen of the House, I favor the pending bill, notwithstanding the fact that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is also in favor of it. [Laughter.] I think it is a meritorious measure but not on the same grounds advanced by the gentleman from Texas. I agree with him that the park police are a fine body of men and an efficient organization. The Metropolitan police force are also a fine body of men and an efficient organization. Of course, in both organizations there may be a few exceptions. We have heard some of the good points of the park police discussed here. Now, let us reflect on some of the good points in favor of the Metropolitan police. We remember not many months ag when we had those assaults upon white women in the Capitol Grounds. Although the crimes were committed in the Capitol Grounds it was not the park police but the Metropolitan police who did the detective work that brought the criminal to the electric chair. That was the Jackson case. Lieutenant Davis, of the fifth precinct of the Metropolitan police force did some exceptional detective work in that case.

Mr. BLANTON. That man Jackson is still alive to-day, unhanged and unelectrocuted, while a murderer over here in Alexandria, Va., who committed his crime long afterwards, has been executed within three months after he killed his victim.

Mr. SCHAFER. Well, the fact that Jackson has not been sent to the electric chair up to the present time can not be laid at the door of the police department or any member of the police department. They did a wonderful piece of detective work and apprehended the criminal who confessed and was found guilty by a jury of his peers. The fact that Jackson has not been electrocuted up to this time is not an argument against the Metropolitan police.

Mr. BLANTON. An employee of the Pennsylvania Railroad was the cause of that man being arrested and caught, and he got a big reward for it.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman does not give all the facts in the case. Having been around the fifth precinct at the time the Metropolitan police were trailing Jackson, I have some knowledge of exceptional police work which was required to apprehend and convict the criminal.

Mr. BLANTON. What was the gentleman doing around the fifth precinct? I protest. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for three additional minutes.

Mr. SCHAFER. I will tell the gentlemen that while I was very busy in my office in the House Office Building a sneak thief came in and took my pocketbook from a coat hanging on a clothes tree. I had my suspicions as to who the gentleman was who took it, and therefore I had gone down to No. 5 precinct to make the rounds of the places where sneak thieves usually hang out, in order to identify him. I therefore had an opportunity to see what was being done in the Jackson case. I will also say to the gentleman that I have been around this District many nights, and I have been able to find many more than two policemen on the beat. It might be well if a certain Member of this House, in view of statements as to finding only two policemen on an extended night tour of the district, would introduce a bill to furnish each Metropolitan police with a hurdy-gurdy machine with a record which would announce, "Here comes a Metropolitan policeman," so that all the crooks, bootleggers, and some Members of Congress may hear and know where the police may be. Perhaps a cowbell such as is placed on Texas steers may be better than a hurdy-gurdy machine. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. We will forgive the gentleman this time, but he had better not go down there any more. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHAFER. I sincerely hope that this House will have the opportunity to consider the bill to raise the salaries of the Metropolitan police force. I think the gentleman from Texas stretched the point when he stated that about 150 members of the Metropolitan police force are rotten. I do not agree with him for one moment on that. Generally speaking, they are a fine class of honest, efficient men. Of course, there may be a few exceptions. I believe that all working men, whether they work in the factory or on the farm or in the Government service, should receive a living wage. We know that the cost of living and the cost of rent in Washington is much higher than in any other part of the country. We should pay the members of the Metropolitan police force higher salaries than they are now receiving, so that they can properly care for their families and educate their children. I believe in the enforcement of all law without fear or favor.

The people of the congressional district which I have the honor to represent voted overwhelmingly or about 7 to 1 in favor of modification of the Volstead Act to permit 2¾ per cent beer by weight.

We who favor modification of this act do not for one moment desire a lax enforcement of the present law. We well know that strict enforcement without fear or favor will bring new recruits to the ranks of those who favor modification. The crooks and bootleggers do not favor modification because they well know that it would interfere with their outlaw business and enormous profits.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself three minutes.

Mr. Chairman, a number of prominent citizens came to me as a member of the District Committee, and said that the 1,348 policemen were in three shifts and that there should be a late night shift doing duty on the streets. They asked me to go with them to see exactly how very few policemen were on the shift after midnight. They claimed that it was the physical presence of policemen on the streets where they could be seen that largely deters crime. I would not listen to them for a long time, but they insisted. They said that Congress was paying $9,000,000 of the Government's money out of the Treasury each year on expenses of the District, a part of which went to these night policemen, and that it was in the interest of the people of the United States Government for us to see whether these policemen were earning their salaries and doing night duty.

So that struck me forcibly when they said the people of the United States were paying for something they were not getting, so I agreed to go. But I made the trip by myself. I got in my car at a quarter of 1, and I did drive 40 miles. I drove from the Key Bridge on the Potomac at the foot of Pennsylvania Avenue, all the way up Pennsylvania Avenue past the White House, the Treasury, the Capitol, and the Library, to the Anacostia Bridge. There was not a single policeman in sight, not one.

I drove all the way up F Street and there was not one on F Street; I drove all the way down G Street and there was not a single one on G Street. I drove all the way out Fourteenth Street and there was not a single policeman on Fourteenth Street, not one; and I did not find any in that 40 miles between 12.45 up until after 2 o'clock a. m. except two. There were but two policemen visible to the eye in Washington, and they were near Seventh and Florida Avenue. I stopped and reported this fact to several stations. I stopped at stations No. 1, and No. 3, and No. 6. I asked them where their night force was and they told me they were on the streets. I said to the officer in charge at No. 3, "If you will send one of your officers with me now and you can show me five policemen on the streets of Washington within the next hour I will pay you $100 in cash," but they would not accept my proposition and would not send one.

I waited for about four nights and again I got in my car at a quarter of 1 and I made the same identical drive that I had made before and on the identical streets I had covered before I counted 76 policemen, 76 in making the same drive upon which I had formerly found only 2. I found out that since my first trip they had put on two extra night inspectors to force night policemen to serve. So you see I did accomplish something, by using my time at night when the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] was asleep, in behalf of the people of Wisconsin and the rest of the United States, who pay a part of this expense.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for 14 minutes.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I wish to call the attention of the House to what I consider a very peculiar police situation in the District. There are 12 police systems here with a total of 2,206 policemen. I do not know of a city in this country of comparable size that has so large a number of policemen as does the District of Columbia. We have 1,285 regular policemen; added to that number are 63 crossing policemen, who are paid by the street-car companies. In addition there are 23 guards at the jail, 9 at the District Building, and 35 guards and bailiffs with the different courts in Washington. Of the 1,285 regular policemen in Washington, 23 of them are women, and it is urged in a pending bill that we increase the number of policewomen until the total reaches 67.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a correction?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Counting the crossing policemen, there are exactly 1,348.

Mr. COLLINS. That is exactly what I said, only I have divided them and you have lumped them. In addition to the ones already mentioned who are under District authorities there are 68 park policemen. They are under Colonel Grant, of the United States Army. Added to these are 302 guards or quasi policemen in various buildings in Washington. In fact, all of the buildings in Washington, except the Treasury, Veterans' Bureau, and Agricultural Department are in charge of these guards or police under Colonel Grant. In the Agricultural Buildings and grounds there are 79 policemen or guards. In the Veterans' Bureau there are 30, and in the Treasury there are 89. There are 29 policemen in the Library of Congress. There are 9 in the National Gallery of Arts, 64 in the Museum, 73 in the Capitol, 39 in the White House, and 10 in the Zoological Gardens. All police total 2,206, and this total does not include 40 guards at the Work House and 27 at the reformatory, because these institutions are outside the District.

The District has more policemen than the city of Baltimore, a city with almost twice its population. There are 1,887 in Baltimore. There are more policemen in Washington than the entire clerical staff of the Navy. There are almost twice as many policemen here as the entire clerical staff of the Post Office Department, and we have approximately as many policemen here as the entire clerical staff of the War Department.

Now, then, what is going to happen if this bill passes raising the salary of the park police to the salary of the Metropolitan police? Another bill will immediately follow to raise the salaries of all of the rest of the various police departments in Washington. The chairman of the Appropriations Committee told me to-day that there are only two cities in the entire country that pay their policemen as much as they are paid in Washington, and those two cities are New York and Chicago, and the amount paid here is approximately as much as the amount paid in those cities.

If it is the will of this House that these men's salaries be raised, well and good; however, I want you to know the amount that is paid them now, which seems to me adequate. The lowest ranking privates receive now $1,700; the next class, $1,800; and the next class, $2,000; a sergeant receives $2,300; a first sergeant, $2,400; lieutenants, $2,700; and captains, $3,000; and it is proposed in this bill to increase these salaries to larger amounts. All of us have an interest in this matter, for our districts pay an important part in the cost of District administration.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield just a moment?

Mr. COLLINS. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. What is the occasion of the large number of police at the Department of Agriculture, the Veterans' Bureau Building, and the Library?

Mr. COLLINS. The gentleman will have to ask some one other than me. I can not answer. They were here when I arrived. However, all Government buildings here are equally well filled with police.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The gentleman is a member of the committee that appropriates the money for this purpose, and there is no law compelling the Committee on Appropriations to appropriate for these men.

Mr. COLLINS. I am not responsible for it. In fact, I have protested on several occasions, and I am now protesting.

I yield back the remainder of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself three minutes.

This bill affects 70 men. It will cost the Government $6,400 per year. Up until last year the park police were on a parity with the members of the Metropolitan police force because the members of the Metropolitan police force, while they received approximately $100 more in salary, were compelled to buy their own uniforms.

Last year the committee passed a bill providing free uniforms so that the members of the Metropolitan police force now receive a little less than $100 more than the members of the park police and this bill simply attempts to equalize the salaries. It only affects 70 men and the total cost to put these two forces on an equal basis is $6,400.

As to the number of policemen and guards in the city and in the various departments, that is a matter entirely in the discretion and judgment and wisdom of the Committee on Appropriations of which committee the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] is a member. The District of Columbia Committee has endeavored to legislate so as to authorize a sufficient number of men to safeguard the lives of the citizens and the property of the Government here. None of these laws which are permissive in their nature compels the Committee on Appropriations to appropriate for them, but this bill, which is a Senate bill, is a just measure and the committee feels it should be passed.

In reference to the statement made by the gentleman from Texas regarding the police and firemen pay bill, which is on the calendar and to which considerable opposition has developed, I would say that the increases to the members of the fire and police departments range from $500 to the chief of the fire department, and the major and superintendent of police—down to $300 for all other members of the force, and while the aggregate cost of the increases amount to a very large sum—$660,000—at the same time, this is less than $10,000 over the increases provided in the bill proposed by the gentleman from Texas, and my understanding is that the opposition to this bill on the part of some of the Members of the House is not because of the increase of $500 to the chiefs, but to the very large sum involved in this legislation.

I wish to insert herewith a copy of the report on the park police bill now pending, for the information of the Members of the House.

(Report to accompany S. 1628)

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1628) relating to the office of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

This bill has passed the Senate, and the Committee on the District of Columbia of the United States Senate made a very full report thereon, a copy of which is hereto appended and made a part of this report.

[Senate Report No. 261, Seventieth Congress, first session]

By act of May 27, 1924 (43 Stat. L. 175), the rates of pay of members of the United States park police force were set at and still are $100 per annum less than the salaries paid members of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia. The duties and obligations of members of the two forces are practically identical, the jurisdiction of the park police force, however, being limited to Government reservations within the District of Columbia.

The present distinction in rates of pay, resulting in a lower scale for the park police, was made solely because members of that force in the past have been and now are furnished with uniforms at Government expense, while previous to May 25, 1926, the members of the Metropolitan police force were obliged to purchase uniforms and other equipment from their own personal funds. Therefore, it was considered that a somewhat lower salary schedule for members of the park police equalized their pay with that of the Metropolitan police.

However, on the date last mentioned, the President signed the bill (H. R. 3807, 44 Stat. 635), making allowance from District funds for supplying uniforms to members of the Metropolitan police force. This resulted in destroying the equality of actual compensation previously existing as between members of the two forces.

The effect of the present bill, if enacted, will be to simply restore the parity of pay. Present salaries of members of the park police force range from $1,700 per annum for class 1 privates to $2,700 for lieutenant.

The bill will not increase the salaries of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia, but applies only to the less than 70 members of the park police force, and will involve an annual increase of appropriation of only approximately $6,400.

A similar bill was approved by the Bureau of the Budget in 1926, and passed the Senate, but lack of time before final adjournment prevented passage by the House and enactment into law.

Appended hereto and made a part of this report is letter of Col. U. S. Grant 3d, Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital, fully explanatory of the need and purpose of the proposed legislation.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND PUBLIC PARKS OF THE NATIONAL CAPITAL,
Washington, D. C., February 4, 1928.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
Chairman District of Columbia Committee,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Complying with the request of the clerk of your committee, the following statement is submitted in confirmation of my verbal statement as to the desirability of equalizing the pay of the park police with that now received by the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia in similar or corresponding grades. Congress did so equalize the salaries of the two forces by the act approved May 27, 1924 (Public, 148, 68th Cong.), prescribing definitely in separate paragraphs of the act the salaries that were to be paid for each force in each grade.

The reason for this segregation of the two forces in the act was the fact that the park police were then receiving their uniforms at Government expense and the salaries were fixed at $100 less per annum than the salaries of the corresponding grades in the Metropolitan police force, the latter being required to furnish their uniforms at their own expense. The records of this office showed that the average per annum cost to the Government of uniforms and personal equipment was a little over $94.

Subsequently by the act approved May 25, 1926 (Public, No. 282, 69th Cong.), the remuneration of the Metropolitan police was increased to provide uniforms at Government expense. No corresponding increase was provided for the park police, so that the members of the latter force now receive $100 a year less than the same grades in the Metropolitan police

This inequality in pay naturally puts the office of public buildings and public parks at a disadvantage in securing suitable personnel for police duty, and creates an understandable dissatisfaction in the minds of the park police, particularly as the duties of the latter are somewhat more severe than those of the Metropolitan police, in so far as the small size of the force does not permit of an equal number of days off.

While the duties of the two forces are sufficiently different in character to appeal to different personal tastes, they are of equal importance to the public and comprise equivalent risks and rather more exposure to the elements on the part of the park police.

As the park police are handling holiday crowds or a public intent upon recreation and relaxation, more tact and good judgment is requisite on the part of the police charged with enforcing the park regulations than is required on the part of the average policeman handling the public on the streets of the city. In spite of this the park police are frequently called upon to handle disorderly persons and crowds, as well as very large numbers of people, larger than can be assembled in close proximity on any street, on the occasions of ceremonies and popular sports. When the emergency does arise in which a park policeman has to resort to force and violent measures it usually comes in fairly isolated places in which he can not obtain help or the moral support of any number of passing persons. Moreover, the long periods of night duty in isolated and lonely parts of the larger parks, such as Rock Creek and Potomac Parks, in winter time constitute a more monotonous duty than on a city beat where the patrolman has the advantage of a certain amount of social intercourse with friendly residents and the public, as well as an occasional opportunity to secure shelter against the elements. The following tabulated statement indicates pretty well the scope of the services rendered by the park police during the last fiscal year:

Total arrests	1,144
Number of cases dismissed	20
Total fines imposed	$7,561.50
Total forfeitures	$2,247.00
Stolen automobiles recovered	38
Sick or injured sent home or to hospital	151
Automobile accidents reported	437
Lost children returned to parents	16

It is noteworthy that dividing the total number of arrests by the number of privates of the park police, the average number of arrests by each would be about 21. This sufficiently shows the value of such police protection to Government property and to the public. That this average is not raised by any unnecessary arrests and that the park police has been unexpectedly successful in carrying out the policy of this office to secure enforcement of the regulations without recourse to arrests except when absolutely necessary, is sufficiently shown by the fact that for two years more than 98 per cent of the arrests made by them have been followed by conviction in the courts or by practical admission of guilt on the part of the accused by forfeiture of the collateral put up for appearance in court.

In conclusion it is pointed out that S. 1628 provides for equalizing the salaries of the two police forces, so as to do away with the necessity in the future for such legislation for each, should the pay of either be increased again. The aggregate increase in the annual appropriation involved by the passage of this act at the present time is only $6,400. Similar legislation introduced last year and reported favorably by your committee received the approval of the President through the Director of the Budget.

Very respectfully,

U. S. GRANT, 3d, Director.

I ask for the reading of the bill, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read the bill for amendment.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House, without amendment, with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LAGUARDIA, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (S. 1628) relating to the Office of Public Buildings and Public Parks in the National Capital, had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment, with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, it is now expected that the legislative appropriation bill will be brought in to-morrow and that general debate will be started on that bill immediately.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Let me ask the gentleman from New York a question, if I may. When does the gentleman expect us to consider legislation with respect to Muscle Shoals, if at all, during this session of Congress? The reason I ask the gentleman the question now is that I recall that the gentleman from New York stated during the last Congress that unless something was done with Muscle Shoals he was going to take it upon himself to at least try to have some legislation enacted. A bill has now passed the Senate and has been reported by the Committee on Military Affairs and is now pending before the Committee on Rules. I have seen this afternoon what purported to be a list of preferred rules. There are four of them, and none of them is with respect to Muscle Shoals. I would like to ask the gentleman, and I think he ought to tell the House and the country, whether he intends to have that legislation considered.

Mr. SNELL. I will say to the gentleman that at the time that preferred rule list was given out the Muscle Shoals bill had not been reported to the House. That was a tentative program, and I do not know of any reason now why we should not follow it out.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Does the gentleman expect to report a rule for Muscle Shoals legislation at this session in sufficient time for it to be considered at this session with a view to putting it into law?

Mr. SNELL. I was hopeful we could do something with respect to Muscle Shoals at this session, I will say to the gentleman, and that is all I care to say at the present time.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. The gentleman is hopeful he can do that. The gentleman is chairman of the Rules Committee and ought to be able to say whether he is going to bring in a rule or not.

Mr. SNELL. I do not always speak for the whole Rules Committee.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Will the gentleman as chairman of the Rules Committee make an effort to do so—I will try to bring it down to the personal equation.

Mr. SNELL. Is that all?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I would like to get an answer if I can. [Laughter.] I want to put the gentleman in the attitude, if I can, of saying whether he intends to carry out what the gentleman promised to do in the last Congress, because it is up to the gentleman to either shoot or give up the gun.

Mr. SNELL. So far as the gentleman from New York is concerned, he has always been anxious to get something done with respect to Muscle Shoals. The gentleman from New York is not in favor of Government ownership of Muscle Shoals. [Applause.] I was hopeful some other kind of bill could be presented to this House and that we could consider it, and I have not yet given up hope; but I will not say now that we will not consider this one.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from New York whether committee prints of the legislative bill will be available in the morning, or does the gentleman know about that?

Mr. SNELL. I do not know.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman from New York know whether the conference report on the independent offices bill will be called up in the morning?

Mr. SNELL. I have not heard about that.

POEM BY MR. JOHN ALVIN GARRETT

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a poem written by Mr. John Alvin Garrett, of Rising Sun, Ind., on the submarine S-4.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The poem is as follows:

SUBMARINE "S-4"

Nigh fathom twenty sunk they lie,
Awaiting rescue or to die,
Entrapt inside a submarine
With death approaching on the scene;
The crew compose their minds with dice,
More for the pleasure than the vice.

We pass along upon our way
To seek the pleasures of the day,
Or rack the brain with one concern,
To make to-day a good return
With wealth employed to sell or buy
While valiant men thus bravely die.

Condemn a Cain by court's decree,
We sue the courts to set him free;
And here we pause with sombre grin
To scan the daily bulletin
And read the news with scarce a sigh,
When such brave men with honor die.

A heavy sea does now prevail,
A timely rescue soon must fail;
The air consumed, they gasp for breath,
And faint, and then succumb to death;
And at half mast Old Glory waves
In mourning for these valiant braves.

FARM RELIEF

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Mississippi in favor of the McNary-Haugen bill.

There was no objection.

Mr. MCNARY. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. CARAWAY. I desire to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is necessarily detained by illness in his family. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

IN SENATE, STATE OF NEW YORK,
Albany, March 5, 1928.

Whereas the project of an all-American ship canal across the State of New York, connecting the Great Lakes with the Atlantic Ocean, continues to be a subject of public agitation and discussion and is of deep concern to the people of the State of New York and to the Nation at large; and

Whereas in the consideration of such project it has been urged that the route of the present Erie Barge Canal should generally be followed in the construction of the work; and

Whereas many populous communities exist along such route and many industrial establishments have for years been maintained thereon that would be served and benefited by such a ship canal; and

Whereas the work being done by the General Government in making a deeper channel in the Hudson River and the establishment of a port at Albany are well under way; and

Whereas the confluence of the Erie Barge Canal and of the Champlain Barge Canal is at the head of tidewater in the Hudson River at Troy: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That if the Federal Government shall decide to build a ship canal across the State of New York and the constitution of this State shall be amended in the prescribed manner, so as to permit of the transfer to that Government of the existing Erie Barge Canal as a part of a national waterways route, it is the earnest recommendation of the legislature of this State that the eastern portion of such ship canal shall be built to follow the historic route of the Mohawk River and the Erie Barge Canal to the head of tidewater in the Hudson River at Troy, thus securing the advantages of existing canal structures and the continued serving and further development of the municipalities and the numerous important industries now established both along such route and in and between the cities of Albany, Troy, Schenectady, Watervliet, Rensselaer, and Cohoes; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted by the clerk of this senate to each United States Senator and Representative in Congress from the State of New York.

By order of the senate,

ERNEST A. FAY, Clerk.

In assembly, March 21, 1928.
Concurred in without amendment.
By order of the assembly,

FRED W. HAMMOND, Clerk.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution of the Central Labor Union of Washington, D. C., which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas there is now pending in the Senate of the United States a bill (H. R. 8298) proposing to move the farmers' produce market now operated by the District of Columbia, and to limit the business on said market to wholesale transactions only; and

Whereas the said farmers' produce market as now conducted permits both retail and wholesale business, and is of vast direct benefit to the people of the District of Columbia by reason of—

1. Retail buying done there by consumers;

2. Its stabilizing effect on food prices throughout the District of Columbia and vicinity;

3. Preventing a monopoly in the storage and distribution of our food supply; and

Whereas it has been estimated that consumers buy at retail direct from the farmers on said market food amounting to approximately $600,000 per year at an average saving of over $150,000 per year; and

Whereas if retail sales are prohibited on said market all of said benefits to the public who now enjoy the privilege of buying at retail from the farmers will be lost, thereby increasing the already high cost of living; and

Whereas the people of the District of Columbia want and need a retail produce farmers' market easily accessible with adequate transportation facilities as near as practicable to the geographical center and center of population; and

Whereas the Terminal Refrigerating & Warehousing Co., the Potomac Freight Terminal Co., and the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. have successfully lobbied through the House of Representatives and the District Committee of the Senate the above bill restricting the farmers' market to wholesale operations, and designating as its future location the very extreme southwest edge of the District of Columbia on land directly opposite a public school and adjoining their own property, which they, of course, desire to sell or rent (but control) to commission men and others for their own financial gain and benefit, but to the detriment to the rights, welfare, and interests of the wage earners of the District and vicinity; and

Whereas the farmers who stand on the farmers' market are practically unanimous in their demand for retail privileges at some convenient and accessible location both for them and their customers; and

Whereas the present local situation is an exact miniature replica of the class struggle going on throughout the entire United States where small but powerful and well-organized financial interests are gradually obtaining control of the supply and distribution of the necessities of life to the detriment of and against the protests of the great masses of farmers and consumers; and

Whereas the above bill if enacted into law would be class legislation in that it not only takes rights and privileges from but imposes hardships and burdens upon our unrepresented masses and benefits only big business and the money classes, thereby again emphasizing how helpless and inarticulate we are without District suffrage and representation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Central Labor Union of Washington, D. C., go on record as opposed to the passage of the bill now pending before the Senate, and that the secretary be authorized and directed to forward a copy of these resolutions to the President of the United States, to the Vice President of the United States (with the request that it be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD), to each Member of the Senate, and to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BRUCE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Baltimore, Md., praying for the passage of legislation granting increased pensions to Civil War veterans and their widows, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WARREN presented resolutions adopted by the Lions Clubs of Kemmerer and Torrington; by Washakie Post, No. 61, the American Legion, of Pavillion, and of Jacksons Hole Post, No. 43, the American Legion, of Jackson, all in the State of Wyoming, favoring the passage of legislation to provide for aided and directed settlement on Federal reclamation projects, which were referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts presented numerous telegrams in the nature of memorials from sundry citizens and business firms of Boston, Newton Highlands, and Watertown, all in the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill 3555, the so-called McNary-Haugen farm relief bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented letters and papers in the nature of petitions signed by members of the Young Women's Christian Association and the Rooming House Association, of Boston, also by sundry citizens of Boston, Allston, Chelsea, Brookline, Cambridge, Quincy, Winchester, Reading, and North Wilmington, all in the State of Massachusetts, praying for the passage of Senate Joint Resolution 122, providing for the reuniting of families of alien declarants, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. NORBECK presented a telegram from a committee of the Spink County Farmers Union at Redfield, S. Dak., which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REDFIELD, S. DAK., March 19, 1928.

LIMIT TO WORK OF RAILROAD EMPLOYEES

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I desire to introduce a bill to limit the number of days that a man may be consecutively employed on a railroad. At the present time there is no provision of law that prohibits the railroad companies from employing men consecutively as long as they please. I think that is a dangerous practice, and I ask that the bill which I introduce may be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 3980) to provide a six-day week for railroad employees was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That after the passage of this act no employee of any railroad engaged in interstate commerce in the United States shall be required to work more than six days per week consecutively except when the superintendent of any railway division or some higher railroad official shall declare an emergency exists, and in no case shall any employee be compelled to work more than 13 days consecutively, and every railroad employee shall be permitted at least four days of rest out of each calendar month of the year: Provided, That the monthly rate of pay of railroad employees shall not be decreased because of the provisions of this law.

C., to the place of residence in the State of the Senator or Representative by whom employed, at the time such trip is made, and return therefrom, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1929, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MOSES submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 15), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH TURKEY

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 194), which was ordered to lie on the table:

Whereas by treaty of commerce and navigation concluded May 7, 1830, proclaimed February 4, 1832; by treaty of commerce and navigation concluded February 25, 1862, proclaimed July 2, 1862; by extradition treaty concluded August 11, 1874, proclaimed May 26, 1875; and by protocol on right to hold real estate in Turkey, proclaimed October 29, 1874, provision was made for the regulation of relations between the United States of America and Turkey; and

Whereas by Title XLVII of the Revised Statutes, and particularly section 4125 thereof, the Congress provided legislation for carrying into effect such treaty of 1830; and

Whereas on April 20, 1917, the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Turkey presented to the ambassador from the United States the following:

SUBLIME PORTE,
MINISTRY OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
OFFICE OF THE MINISTER,
April 20, 1917.

No. 95995/172.

Mr. AMBASSADOR: The Embassy of the United States of America having informed the Imperial Ministry of Foreign Affairs by its note verbale of April 8, 1917, No. 242, that its Government is in a state of war with the German Empire, I have the honor to inform your excellency that the Imperial Ottoman Government, ally of this Empire, is obliged to break its diplomatic relations with the Government of the United States of America beginning from to-day.

Please accept, Mr. Ambassador, the assurance of my highest esteem.

(Signed) AHMED NESSIMI.

His Excellency Mr. ELKUS,
Ambassador of the United States of America.

And

Whereas it has been urged that this breaking off of diplomatic relations with the Government of the United States of America operated to annul and abrogate all treaties between the United States and Turkey; and

Whereas the breaking off of diplomatic relations was based entirely on the fact that the Government of the United States was in a state of war with the German Empire, an ally of Turkey; and

Whereas it is a well-recognized principle of international law that a treaty can not be so abrogated unilaterally and that severance of diplomatic relations does not, ipso facto, terminate treaties made between sovereign powers; and

Whereas it is believed that the severance of diplomatic relations as embodied in the above communication from the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Turkey, would not affect the status of existing treaties between the United States and Turkey; and

Whereas it is believed that such treaties continued and still continue in full force and effect; and

Whereas on January 18, 1927, the Senate refused to advise and consent to the treaty to regulate general relations between the United States and Turkey, signed at Lausanne, Switzerland, on August 6, 1923; and

Whereas, subsequently to such refusal, on February 17, 1927, Admiral M. L. Bristol, acting presumably under instructions from the President, exchanged notes with the Turkish Minister of Foreign Affairs wherein it was agreed that the United States would establish diplomatic relations with Turkey upon the principles of international law and proceed to the appointment of ambassadors as soon as possible, such notes constituting the so-called modus vivendi of February 18, 1927; and

Whereas Moukhtar Bey has been designated by the Kemalist Government as Turkish ambassador to the United States and has been received by the President as such ambassador; and

Whereas on May 20, 1927, and during a recess of the Senate, the President made a recess appointment of Joseph C. Grew as ambassador to Turkey; and

Whereas the nomination of Joseph C. Grew as ambassador to Turkey was submitted to the Senate December 9, 1927; and

Whereas such modus vivendi purports to reestablish normal diplomatic and treaty relations with Turkey when, as a matter of fact, such relations are governed by the above treaties, which have not been abrogated; and

Whereas by the preamble to the Lausanne treaty the parties agree to "regulate the conditions of intercourse and residence of their nationals on their respective territories and to reestablish their consular and commercial relations in accordance with the principles of international law and on the basis of complete reciprocity * * *," and such modus vivendi also proposes to "regulate, in accordance with the principles of international law and on a basis of complete reciprocity the commercial and consular relations * * *"; and

Whereas it is believed that the President can resume relations with Turkey, if at all, on the basis only of the treaty of 1830, and the supplemental treaties above referred to, or on the basis of a new treaty to be entered into and ratified by the Senate in accordance with the Constitution; and

Whereas such modus vivendi is relied upon by the State Department as the basis for the reception of Moukhtar Bey as ambassador from Turkey, the recess appointment of Joseph C. Grew as ambassador to Turkey, and the subsequent submission of the nomination of Joseph C. Grew as ambassador to Turkey; and

Whereas it is recognized that a modus vivendi is but a temporary arrangement entered into by Executive agreement without the advice and consent of the Senate, and merely contemplates temporary action until the completion of negotiations will give the Senate an opportunity to pass upon the subject matter in the form of a treaty; and

Whereas action by the Executive, after rejection of a treaty, undertaking to put into effect the terms of such treaty, will deprive the Senate of its power to advise and consent in the making of treaties and constitute an attempt to supersede the supreme law of the land by Executive action; and

Whereas such modus vivendi is not only futile and ineffectual as an attempted provision for diplomatic relations already covered by treaties ratified and in effect but is also illegal, null, and void, and of no effect by reason of its attempted undertaking of action already rejected by the Senate in the form of a treaty: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that (1) resumption of diplomatic relations with Turkey otherwise than on the basis of the treaty of 1830 and supplemental treaties of 1862 and 1874, (2) the reception of Moukhtar Bey as Turkish ambassador to the United States, (3) the recess appointment of Joseph C. Grew as ambassador to Turkey, and (4) the subsequent submission to the Senate of the nomination of Joseph C. Grew as ambassador to Turkey, were invalid acts on the part of the Executive, subversive of the harmonious relations which should exist between the Executive and legislative departments of the Government, and constitute a serious and unwarranted infringement by the Executive on the constitutional powers of the Senate and a violation of both the spirit and letter of the Constitution.

Mr. CURTIS. Is the amendment suggested by the committee?

Mr. CARAWAY. The amendment is in accordance with the agreement made with the House committee.

Mr. CURTIS. It is satisfactory to the Senate Committee on Commerce?

Mr. CARAWAY. I feel absolutely certain that it is.

Mr. CURTIS. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8926) granting the consent of Congress to the State Highway Commission of Arkansas to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across Red River at or near Garland City, Ark.

Mr. CARAWAY's amendment was to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the State Highway Commission of Arkansas to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Red River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Garland City, within 5 miles of the bridge of the St. Louis, Southwestern Railway Co., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. If tolls are charged for the use of the bridge constructed under authority of this act, the State Highway Commission of Arkansas may so adjust the rate of toll to be charged as to produce sufficient revenue to maintain, operate, and repair the bridge and repay the original cost of constructing the same, including any interest paid on borrowed money and discounts necessarily required in financing such original construction, and shall, after the repayment thereof, operate such a bridge as a free bridge, provided that no bonds shall be issued for the building of said bridge that will mature more than 25 years from the date of said bonds.

SEC. 3. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act granting the consent of Congress to the State Highway Commission of Arkansas to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across Red River at or near Garland City, Ark."

DEMOCRATIC PRESIDENTIAL NOMINATION

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I present an article appearing in the New York Herald-Tribune of to-day, entitled "McAdoo demands Walsh nomination to head off Smith," which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MCADOO DEMANDS WALSH NOMINATION TO HEAD OFF SMITH—SENATOR DECLARED "SOBER" AND MAN OF INCORRUPTIBLE INTEGRITY AND COURAGE NEEDED FOR PRESIDENCY—MOVE THREATENS SPLIT AT HOUSTON—EX-SECRETARY IN LETTER TO LOS ANGELES MAN DETAILS MONTANAN'S SERVICES TO LABOR AND AGRICULTURE

By Wilbur Forrest

WASHINGTON, April 9.—A serious threat to Democratic Party harmony was seen here to-night in the open championship of Senator THOMAS J. WALSH, of Montana, by William G. McAdoo in a letter to John B. Elliott, of Los Angeles.

Mr. McAdoo has a following among party drys who may welcome opposition to New York's Governor, now well in the lead for the nomination.

Mr. McAdoo had withdrawn from active politics since the Jackson Day dinner here January 12 and the general impression was that he would remain out of the picture in the interest of party harmony. At that time he announced that he would do so.

M'ADOO BACK IN FIGHT

With the strong lead attained by Governor Smith, of New York, as the candidate for the Democratic nomination, it is now indicated that Mr. McAdoo has thrown himself back into the fight which is a new element seeming to presage a party split on the wet and dry issue.

Governor Smith's "wetness" clashes with McAdoo's "dryness," and his declaration for Senator WALSH, an avowed dry. What effect this all will have at the Houston convention in June can not yet be estimated, but many observers here to-night were not ready to admit that the McAdoo intervention would prevent the nomination of Smith.

In his letter to Mr. Elliott, the former Secretary of the Treasury says he will make some speeches for Senator WALSH. Coincidentally it became known to-night that Senator WALSH intends to invade Massachusetts during the next few days in an effort to share the Bay State delegation with Governor Smith, whose capture of the entire delegation in the April 24 primaries already has been conceded by some.

DETAILS PRESIDENTIAL REQUIREMENTS

Mr. McAdoo's letter begins:

"A President of the United States who would make that great office the true servant of the people, and not the slave of privilege, must have these qualifications:

"Ability, incorruptible integrity, courage, and that all-embracing virtue—character. WALSH possesses all of them to a marked degree."

It is recalled that Mr. McAdoo's entry into the Democratic fight for Senator WALSH was forecast on the floor of the Senate a few days ago when Senator ROBINSON of Indiana twitted Senator WALSH about McAdoo support and the Montanan retorted that Mr. McAdoo had "an inalienable right to support whom he pleased."

Mr. McAdoo's letter, after extolling WALSH'S record and his loyal support of the Woodrow Wilson administration, brings the prohibition issue into play when he says:

"WALSH is dry and WALSH is sober. He practices what he preaches. He is no hypocrite. He indulges in no cant and his life is a daily vindication of his high principles and virtues. If he were elected President of the United States he would demonstrate that the eighteenth amendment can be enforced, because he would enforce it. He would neither nullify the Constitution nor submit to nullifications. The salutary influences of the vigorous administration he would give to the country would have an immeasurably beneficial effect in the suppression of crime and in the restoration of that respect for law which is vital to the perpetuity of democratic institutions."

M'ADOO APPEALS TO VOTER

McAdoo loses no point of appeal to the Democratic voter in his letter, which, as a campaign document, was evidently designed to receive widespread publicity.

An appeal to the feminine Democratic vote is seen in the following section devoted to WALSH'S record:

"WALSH has been a champion of the rights of women. Not only did he assist in framing the nineteenth, or woman's suffrage, amendment but he supported it with his great ability and influence and helped to put it in the Constitution. In like manner he had a conspicuous part in framing the eighteenth amendment. Both the eighteenth and nineteenth amendments went to the Judiciary Committee, of which WALSH was an important member; there he exercised his conspicuous talents in perfecting these important amendments to the organic law of the land."

MR. M'ADOO'S LETTER

The letter from Mr. McAdoo to Mr. Elliott follows:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., April 6, 1928.

"DEAR MR. ELLIOTT: Of course, I will make some speeches for Senator WALSH in the California campaign before May 1 if it is possible for me to leave the important cases here which have kept me in Washington for some time. I shall let you know, at the earliest moment, when, if at all, I can get to California. Meanwhile I must content myself with telling you briefly why I so strongly favor THOMAS J. WALSH for the Democratic presidential nomination.

"A President of the United States, who would make that great office the true servant of all the people, and not the slave of privilege, must have these qualifications: Ability, incorruptible integrity, courage, and that all-embracing virtue—character. WALSH possesses all of them in marked degree.

"When I became Secretary of the Treasury in 1913 I found WALSH in the Senate. A genuine friendship quickly sprang up between us. During the six momentous years I spent in Washington, covering the period of the World War, WALSH was one of the strongest supporters of President Wilson's administration. The valiant service he rendered to his country during that period and since has made him a national figure and one of the foremost leaders of the Democratic Party. There is, in fact, no Democrat in public life to-day whose achievements entitle him to greater honors at the hands of his party than THOMAS J. WALSH.

CITES WORK FOR FARMERS

"With almost every conspicuous and important measure of the Wilson administration WALSH is identified. He strongly supported the Federal reserve act, which has conferred incalculable benefits on all classes of the American people. He fought effectively for the Federal farm loan act, under which the farmers of the United States have been able to secure farm-mortgage loans at low interest rates. The good-roads law found in him an effective advocate. Under this law thousands of miles of magnificent highways have been built throughout the United States with the aid of Federal funds. When the United States entered the World War, WALSH aided every measure that would bring the war to a swift and successful conclusion. He supported the war risk insurance act, under which the life of every American soldier and sailor was insured, indemnities for injuries paid, and financial aid given to the dependent families of those who had gone to the front.

"As a western man, he understands the problems of the people of the West. Because of his intelligent and able efforts on the floor of the Senate laws have been put on the statute books under which the development of the resources of the West, theretofore hermetically sealed through a narrow and shortsighted policy, has gone forward with distinct benefit to the entire country.

DETAILS EFFORTS FOR LABOR

"It was WALSH who secured exemption of farm and labor organizations from the unjust provisions of the Sherman Antitrust Act. It was through WALSH'S efforts that regulation of the issuance of injunctions and the right of trial by jury in cases of contempt not committed in the presence of the court were secured for labor. This relief, very properly called labor's magna charta, had been vainly sought by laboring men for 20 years. WALSH has been as just and impartial in his fight for the rights of laboring men as he has been for the rights of legitimate business, as exemplified by his staunch support of the Federal reserve act and other economic measures."

The letter continues:

"WALSH is tolerant and WALSH is wise.

"His tolerance was never better manifested than in the fight he made for the confirmation of Louis D. Brandeis, one of the outstanding Jews of the United States, as an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court. When President Wilson named this great Jew for one of the highest positions in the land he was assailed by narrow and vindictive partisans who sought to prevent the Brandeis confirmation. WALSH'S fight for Brandeis resulted in placing upon the Supreme Bench of the United States a man whose signal ability has been a constant contribution to the work of that great court.

TELLS OF WILSON'S APPRECIATION

"His wisdom was conclusively demonstrated when, in 1916, President Wilson, then seeking reelection, selected him as manager of western headquarters at Chicago. We in California know that it was WALSH'S management of the western campaign that gave Woodrow Wilson his second term as President. In this achievement California played a conspicuous and determining part. So warmly did President Wilson appreciate WALSH's great service that he wrote the following letter:

"THE WHITE HOUSE,
"Washington, November 16, 1916.

"Hon. THOMAS J. WALSH,
"Helena, Mont.

"MY DEAR SENATOR: At last I am back at my desk. The formidable mass of business waiting for me begins to clear a little and I am free to give leave to what my heart dictates.

"And one of the first things that it dictates is a letter of gratitude and admiration to yourself. It is not only my own judgment but the judgment of all who have been associated with you that the western headquarters were conducted in the most admirable and efficient manner and with a most delightful harmony of cooperation, and I feel that the party is your debtor for a notable service.

"May I not express my own deep personal regard and sincere admiration and appreciation?

"Cordially and sincerely,

"(Signed) WOODROW WILSON.

MORE PRAISE FROM WILSON

"In 1918, when WALSH was running for reelection as Senator from Montana, President Wilson sent the following letter in support of WALSH to Governor Stewart, of Montana:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., October 14, 1918.

"Hon. S. V. STEWART, Governor,
"Executive Offices, Helena, Mont.

"MY DEAR GOVERNOR STEWART: Your letter propounds a question which is very easy and very pleasant to answer. Senator WALSH has earned for himself in the Senate of the United States a place of real distinction, and has earned it not only by being consistent and diligent to promote the legitimate interests of his State and by consistent support of the constructive measures which have during his term been enacted in the public interest, but also by very unusual legal ability and political judgment. My own feeling toward him, of course, is very warm, because of his very consistent and generous support of the administration, but that ground of approbation is perhaps too personal, and I mention it only because it gives me so much pleasure to do so.

"Cordially and sincerely,

"WOODROW WILSON.

"WALSH is the implacable foe of corruption in government. Among his great achievements, none is more notable than his courageous and unswerving fight to bring to justice the crooks who attempted to despoil the people of the United States of the naval oil reserves, upon which the Nation may have to depend for its very life if it should again be forced into the horrors of war. Through WALSH'S efforts these reserves, worth, perhaps, $1,000,000,000, have been restored to the people.

CALLED FOE OF CORRUPTION

"Who has exposed corruption in public life with unerring skill and undaunted courage? WALSH! Who has made corruption one of the outstanding issues in the forthcoming presidential campaign? WALSH! Who, as no other man, can make the case against corruption with such power and conviction? WALSH! He personifies the issue and will translate it into victory if he is permitted to lead.

"And who, better than WALSH, knows the problems of the farmers of the West? Through poverty and hardships he came to maturity in the agricultural States of the West. As President he would bring his great talent to bear upon the problem of farm relief and solve it to the satisfaction of the Nation.

"If THOMAS J. WALSH is nominated at Houston, a Democrat—a western Democrat—will occupy the White House from 1929 to 1933 and give the American people an administration of like power and popularity to that of Andrew Jackson, who filled the same great office during the same period a century ago. With WALSH in the White House a just man, an able man, a courageous man, an intellectual man, a great man, and a sober man will lead the people of the United States into a new era of prosperity and law obedience. Fundamental Democratic principles will operate again for the benefit of all classes and all creeds and all races, and the best traditions of Jefferson, Jackson, Cleveland, and Wilson will find new expression and new power.

"The greatest constitutional lawyer in the Senate; a statesman of commanding ability; a public servant of exceptional integrity, industry, and capacity; a progressive Democrat of the highest type; a notable defender of the Constitution, with a mind and a vision as broad as the Nation—this is THOMAS J. WALSH. I hope that California may send a delegation to Houston to present the claims of this great citizen and statesman.

"Cordially yours,

"W. G. MCADOO.

RACIAL POLICY IN CENSUS OFFICE AND ANDERSON (S. C.) POSTMASTER

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I have an article from the Washington Post of March 31, which I would like to have the clerk read. I send to the desk also a letter to myself which I ask that the clerk may read after he has read the article.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read the article and the letter, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, March 31, 1928]

HOOVER CHANGES RACIAL POLICY IN CENSUS OFFICE—COLORED CLERKS NOW IN ALL DEPARTMENTS; ADMINISTRATIVE POSITION SOUGHT—NEGRO ELKS ARE ACTIVE

Colored clerks in the Census Bureau yesterday sought to learn why they have been brought up from the basements and other segregated sections where they have worked for years and placed in all departments of the bureau on equal terms with other workers. It was learned that the order to abolish segregation and racial discrimination in the department came at the order of Herbert Hoover, Secretary of Commerce.

The Secretary was visited by Neval H. Thomas, president of the Association for Advancement of Colored People, and by Robert J. Nelson, executive director of the Civil Liberties Bureau of Colored Elks, who described conditions in the department to him. His order for removal of the alleged discrimination, following an investigation, came just in time to present to the view of E. W. B. Curry, negro editor of Springfield, Ohio, a satisfied group of negro clerks.

Curry, who made a trip here yesterday from Ohio because his candidacy as a Hoover delegate to the Republican National Convention had been injured by charges that the Department of Commerce here was honeycombed with racial segregation, returned to the Buckeye State satisfied that he could safely run as he had planned. It is understood that negro Elks, encouraged by the situation at present, have asked Secretary Hoover for an administrative position in the department of vital statistics, in connection with their national health program.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 6, 1928.

Senator COLE BLEASE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR GOVERNOR BLEASE: I know you are a southern gentleman and not unfriendly to the colored people, but do not believe in mixing them with white people, especially women.

Mr. Hoover, the head of our department, got many of the colored delegates in the South when he gave them Red Cross hams and bacon during the flood. That was probably all right; but now because he has a fight in Ohio and Indiana and wants the colored votes there he has listened to the nigger politicians and has put these colored people among the white girls in the department for the first time.

They have always been in a section to themselves on the first floor and had a toilet set aside for them. Now we have to use the same ones that they use, which is not very pleasant.

I wonder how Mr. Hoover would like to have the women of his family use the same toilet that colored people use. They, of course, would not have to, but under Mr. Hoover's orders we have to.

I was going to get a lot of copies of the notice in the Post and send them to the principal southern papers, but somebody told me that this was just the kind of publicity Herbert Hoover wants, that he would use it in all the colored papers in the country to get them to vote for him in the primary, but you will know more about this than I do, so you can use your own judgment.

None of us want Mr. Hoover to get any delegates any place, since he has acted this way just to help himself politically without considering the feelings of the girls in the department, who can not defend themselves. But if you can do anything, you do as you think best.

We call these colored people Hoover's chocolates and all wish we could make him eat them.

He went into Ohio and acted so mean toward Senator WILLIS that he died, and now he wants to get all the colored votes in Indiana so he can beat Senator WATSON there.

Think of a Secretary of Commerce having to stoop to niggers to win. He has fallen short of running his own department.

We are all in politics now. Hoover's chocolates are for him strong, but the white women are not going to vote for him.

Senator, can you help us? He never showed any love for colored people before the Indiana and Ohio primaries came along. Now, the only way he can get the colored vote is by humiliating white women.

Senator, you must really do something to help us. The white girls in every department in Washington are all wrought up about this. Of course, they won't say anything, because they are afraid of losing their jobs, and they can't afford to do that.

I don't want to lose my job, so please don't use my name. I am going to sign the letter and you can cut it off if you want to.

Mr. Hoover may think this is smart politics to bring his chocolates in with white girls and women, but if he only knew what the white women all over Washington say about it he wouldn't be so sure of carrying Ohio and Indiana with colored votes.

Thanking you for anything you do personally, and I know I speak for thousands of white women working in Washington, I remain,

Very sincerely,

———— ————.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, the letter just read was not written by a resident of my State nor by one who has ever been a resident of my State.

I ask to have inserted along with my remarks without reading an article headed "Herbert Hoover," written by the late Senator Thomas E. Watson, of Georgia, and also an article written by Mr. G. D. Eaton.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The articles referred to are as follows:

[From the Anderson Independent (the paper the people read), Thursday morning, April 5, 1928]

HERBERT HOOVER AS SEEN BY THE LATE UNITED STATES SENATOR, THOMAS E. WATSON

Little did I think that all the fishing exploits of Brother Warren Harding, in the land of flowers, big fish, and malefactors of great wealth, would reach their climax, their zenith, their culmination, and their over-the-topism in the catching of Herbert Hoover, who was born in Iowa, California, Arizona, London, and several other notorious places.

Did several Grecian cities dispute which of them gave birth to Homer?

So we are told; and we are further informed that Homer begged his bread in each of those cities.

In Hoover we see a reincarnation of Homer, but Hoover is built on a vaster scale.

Hoover begged his bread in every city of 48 States, and was born in most of them.

Hoover imagined himself to be an Englishman, and he was advertised to the heathen as a true Briton, with residence and office in London, and we benighted Americans never knew that such a queer fish was in the creek until after our patriotic son-in-law had delivered to England $150,000,000—as a first shot at our Treasury—and we were then officially informed that a new man, named Hoover, had issued orders against our eating sow belly on the Sabbath Day; biscuits on the next day; beefsteak on the next; and had sternly commandeered our hams, our wheat, our sugar, our flour, and had magnanimously permitted it to be known that we could make flour bread once in a while, provided we mixed into it equal parts of rye, oats, barley, bran, and corn cobs.

Hoover did this because nobody else had ever done so.

Above all things, Hoover sought originality; he and another brother named Baruch.

These twins were the gemini of our zodiac.

Having requisitioned our granaries, smokehouses, larders, and sugar jars, this Hoover, Baruch, son-in-law and company, persuaded our cash out of our pockets in exchange for scraps of paper called Liberty bonds.

Oh, how rejoiced we are at the opportunity to spend our last red cent in buying paper issued in carload lots by son-in-law, Hoover, Baruch, and company!

Truly, a citizen without a Liberty bond was a man without a country.

Even the President wrote to his son-in-law asking, "May I not" buy a Liberty bond, and his amiable son-in-law accorded that precious privilege to his father-in-law.

Hoover and company issued so many of these bonds that we lost what little "sense of proportion" nature had given us.

In our patriotic haste to accommodate Hoover and his band we parted gladly with our cash, our credit, our chattels, or customary food, and our inherited notions of law.

We kept wearing our old hats for fear that if we could buy new ones they would learn our opinions, give us away, and cause us to be arrested.

Hoover got more of our money than President Wilson did, and like the President he has never made a showing of his disposal of this money.

No two men that ever lived were given the personal disbursement of such vast amounts of actual cash, and no two persons have ever shown such a determination to conceal their disposition of the public funds.

Banks have to account; railroads have to account; Secretaries of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, of the Interior Department, of the Department of Justice have to account.

Indispensable to a legal accounting, is the accompaniment of vouchers.

Every Pullman car has its system of minute accounts; so has every hotel; so has every administrator, executive, guardian, and trustee.

In the archives of every government, ancient and modern, the historian has found elaborate accounts.

We know approximately what the Pyramids cost; we know what the palace and park of Versailles cost; we know the sums of bribes paid by the British aristocracy to the continental kings who sent conscripted or mercenary armies against the democrats of the French Revolution.

We have a minute account of General Washington's expense during the seven years of the Revolutionary War.

We can tell, within a few rupees, the cost of rearing, three or more centuries ago, the Taj Mahal, the noblest monument that a bereaved husband ever built in memory of a lost wife.

But as to the thousands of dollars confided by the American people to Woodrow Wilson and to Herbert Hoover, we have had no accounting.

The most stupendous sums of money ever intrusted to two human beings remain a mystery, national and international.

What was done with all that treasure, greater than the riches of Solomon, Croesus, of any Mogul Emperor of unpillaged Hindustan?

Nobody knows; nobody will ever know. To ask an accounting is to "malign" Wilson and Hoover.

Apply the same rule to other custodians of trust funds and where would the rule lead us?

Call the executor to settle with the heirs and you "malign him!"

Call the State or national treasurer to make a legal showing and you "malign" him.

Since when did mankind ever hear of such an impudent cloak to cover the disbursement of trust funds?

Brother Warren Harding went down to Florida to rest and fish. I don't know how much rest he got, but I can conscientiously make an affidavit to the fact that his fishing was truly rural.

Wasn't he elected as an opponent of the League?

Wasn't Hoover as much of a Leaguer as Wilson himself?

Wasn't Hoover repudiated by the same voters who repudiated Wilson?

Did not those voters elect Brother Harding?

If Hoover is to control our commerce he will inevitably control our international finance; and whoever controls that will be our boss.

In other words, have we virtually reelected Wilson?

Don't be discouraged; business is going to "revive," now, in short, as the colored brother says.

Don't worry over "new lows" in cotton; these new lows and your apparent lack of money are merely "psychological," as President Wilson once said:

"Psychologically you seem to be in a h—ll of a fix, but as a matter of fact you were never more prosperous; the daily papers are my witnesses."

Psychologically our Government takes German bonds in payment of Belgium's debt to us; and psychologically you do not seem to be able to sell our Government's own bonds at par.

Thus the Huns and the sons of guns elevate their bonds above ours.

With Hoover as our financial boss the blessed Europeans will pay us in German paper, the ten thousand million dollars that Wilson, McAdoo, Hoover, Baruch & Co. loaned to those foreigners.

In like manner the European debts due to our Morgans, Rockefellers, du Ponts, Armours, etc., may be "liquidated" in German paper.

It would never do to monetize our own bonds, but it is all right to validate German bonds.

Many timid Americans were fearful that the monetization of our bonds would flood the country with money and that our gold would run away from us.

But we hear no yells of terror when President Wilson inserts the thin edge of the wedge for all the German war paper by urging Congress to accept from Belgium this German paper as so much money.

Hoover still champions the league, as Cox did.

Hoover still indorses Wilson, as Cox did.

Hoover's appointment to Brother Harding's Cabinet followed a casual visit paid to St. Augustine by trusted representatives of the Morgan banking houses, the Standard Oil companies, and sundry other Wall Street specimens of internationalism.

Hoover himself did not wend his weary way to St. Augustine. Hoover did his fishing over the long-distance telephone, which is also a very good way to fish.

Among the various places where Hoover was born, I regret his discrimination against the South; it behooved Hoover to have recalled the fact that he was born in Charlottesville, taught school in Augusta, got religion in Texas, lost it in Missouri, and endeavored to practice law in "Otionter."

Hoover forgot us; Harding forgot us; they all forgot us; it's a habit they have.

We might as well have elected Cox; and had Cox been elected, he might as well have enthroned Hoover.

With Hoover on deck and the German bonds monetized and the island of Yap going to the Jap, and the kings all returning to their respective abodes, and the Turks mauling the wine out of the French and the Greeks, and the international armaments increasing day by day, and the oil of Mesopotamia pouring trouble instead of peace upon the stormy waters, I have my doubts whether the world has been made safe for democracy, especially as we are still at war with Germany, the Huns, the sons of guns.

To accept at par the paper of a country with which we are yet legally waging a Great War, while refusing to honor our own promises to you—sold at face value—seems odd.

It looks like dealing with the enemy on terms more favorable to the enemy than to the patriotic but melancholy holders of our own bonds.

As I remember the law, Uncle Sam will be violating the espionage act if he aids the enemy by accepting his waste paper as that much money.

Brother Harding, come along "back to the Constitution!"

Enough water is enough, even for a Baptist.

Enough fishing is enough, even for a sport inordinately fond of fishing.

Hoover didn't know whether he was a Democrat or a Republican; he was understood to be too good and great to find room in any party; he ran for President as a Republican, and at that time he ran in California, because he was born there and had a natural right to consider himsedf a favorite son.

He spent some money and he got several votes and he sang low at the national convention.

But the main campaigning has been done since the election of Brother Harding.

The public eye was filled with Hoover, his picture regularly appeared in the papers and magazines; he discovered 3,500,000 more European babes who were starving and who demanded that you send $10 for each of them to Hoover.

"Send us no money," they said; "unbosom your purses upon the faithful Hoover!"

Rockefeller gave Hoover a million, so the papers reported.

The profiteers had the costliest banquets, in the costliest hotels, for Hoover; and they placed near Hoover's table an empty chair and an empty plate for the European babe who had been starving, Hooverishly, for months.

The empty chair now has its occupant, the empty plate is now full; Hoover has angled for the angler, and Hoover's hook did the work.

When Hoover labored under the impression that he had been born on the Pacific slope and cast his bread, as it were, upon those waters he did not catch anything of importance, but when he transferred his birthplace to the Atlantic coast and changed his bait he hooked and landed a whale.

"I repeat it, sir," little did I think that Brother Harding's rest and his fishing would culminate in this Hoover agreeable surprise.

EX CATHEDRA

By G. D. Eaton

THE HEART BENEATH LEGREE'S SHIRT

It is a curious thing that of all the books written on the Civil War and its causes, none—at least none of the several hundred I have read—pays any considerable heed to the effect of the unfair stories of cruelty spread broadcast by the abolitionists, starting from the time that this country established its independence and continuing until Fort Sumter was fired upon. And yet, from reading some thousand pamphlets, I am convinced that the Civil War was brought about by an organized minority of busybodies, engaged in spreading stories, often untrue or exaggerated.

Certainly level-headed and sagacious leadership could easily have avoided the Civil War. The simplest solution would have been the purchase of all slaves by the Government, even at as much as a thousand dollars a head. This would have been twice the average price of the slaves and would have won over the southern planters. It would have cost the Nation in all but three and a half billion dollars, whereas the Civil War cost at least twenty billions—we are still paying for it—and a half million lives. But the sad fact remains that the Federal Government was never allowed to offer any definite sum of money per head for the slaves. Indeed, it was written in the abolitionist code that manumission must be effected only by "immediate and unconditional" emancipation, in sad contrast to the liberation effected in the West Indies by the British emancipators. In the West Indies the slaves had their freedom bought by the English Government.

The whole crusade in America began with efforts of churchmen in the North diametrically opposing the plenipotentiaries of heaven in the South. Actual consideration for the condition of the slave was negligible, as treatment of negroes in the North to-day makes obvious. Such treatment is nothing new. If there were race riots in Detroit yesterday and in St. Louis the day before yesterday, so there were riots in Portsmouth, Ohio, in 1830; in Hartford, Conn., and Providence, R. I., in 1831; three in Philadelphia in the years 1834, 1838, and 1843; in New York in 1834; in Pittsburgh in 1839; in Cincinnati in 1827, 1836, and 1841. In almost all cases the negroes were driven out of town by the hundreds.

In New York negroes were not permitted, except nominally by the courts, to ride in the horse cars with the whites. The negroes in Northern States were put in jail upon every possible excuse. In 1850 we find (United States census) that 1 negro out of every 175 went to jail in Massachusetts, while only 1 white man out of every 2,335 was incarcerated; in New York it was 1 negro from 225 and 1 white out of every 1,713, and in New Jersey it was 1 negro from every 453 and 1 white out of every 3,554. Between 1700 and 1718 we find that there was but one crime in Pennsylvania for which whites could be executed (murder), and four for which negroes might be executed (murder, burglary, rape, and arson).

In almost no northern State was the free negro allowed the franchise, while, contrarily, he exercised civil rights in some Southern States until 1831, when abolition tracts fired off some murderous slave insurrections. Thus we see that Connecticut disfranchised free negroes in its constitution of 1818; Rhode Island in 1822; Ohio in 1803; Indiana as late as 1851; Illinois in 1819. Other States, such as New York, forbade the negro the franchise unless he could show property worth as much as $250. On the other hand, North Carolina did not disfranchise the free negro until its new constitution in 1835, after the South had been terrorized by brutal slave rebellions.

Actual compassion and sympathy for the negro in the North? Nonsense! It existed practically nowhere. As Mr. Dooley has said, "I've seen th' shackles dropped fr'm th' slave so's he cud be lynched in Ohio."

The Northern States generally barred, as I have shown, negroes from the elective franchise before the Civil War, but even after Appomattox 15 Northern States voted negatively on negro suffrage and the fifteenth amendment had to be rammed into the northern State constitutions by the acts of the legislatures. Even in such States as popularly approved negro suffrage the measure came about with a great deal of friction.

Minnesota presents an interesting and somewhat risible example. In both 1865 and 1867 the sovereign people of the State downed negro suffrage by popular vote. Then the Republican Party leaders, getting busy, took census of the negroes and caused the result to be widely broadcast. There were but 411 negroes of both sexes and all ages in the State. In 1868 a third plebiscite made the negro a voting citizen. The fifteenth amendment was virtually railroaded through, to the vast delight of the carpetbaggers and to the consternation of some bona fide Republicans in the North. Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, rising in the Senate Chamber in Washington on January 28, 1868, lugubriously explained that espousal of negro suffrage had cost his party not less than a quarter of a million votes.

Basically not one one-hundredth of the northerners cared the least about liberating the negro, and even honestly furious reform movements encountered tremendous resistance. In the words of William Lloyd Garrison, in the initial number of the Liberator, January 1, 1831, his efforts in the North met "contempt more bitter, opposition more active, detraction more relentless, prejudice more stubborn, and apathy more frozen than among the slave owners themselves," though perhaps he forgot the time (unmentioned in history books) when he was jugged in Baltimore for a libelous attack on a slave owner.

Fewer than half the newspapers in the North were antislavery, and the moneyed people in the North were almost to a man against abolition, the New England mill owners especially laboring under the belief that slave labor kept down the price of raw cotton. When Garrison got a little overzealous in Boston they had him mobbed and dragged through the streets. But the rich were far from being the only ones against abolition.

Everyone knows what happened in New York City when conscription became active. Horace Greeley's emancipating Tribune was almost wrecked and a wild mob took charge of the city. A negro orphan asylum was burned, with the loss of many lives, and adult negroes were strung up on lamp-posts. It took a regiment of Infantry to pacify the city, and then only after a pitched battle in the streets.

All the antislavery movements of early date were launched by religious sects. The first was set going by the Quakers, but it came out of common decency, was honest, and never assumed a virulent form. Nor did the South ever regard the Quakers as enemies. The Quakers spent much actual money, not in helping negroes to escape illicitly from their masters, but to transport free negroes and in bringing suits, where necessary, to guarantee freedom to slaves already manumitted. They preached emancipation, but they lived, hundreds of them, in Virginia and North Carolina in peace and friendliness with their slave-holding neighbors.

But the South did not look upon the efforts of other sects as being sincere. When not only slavery was attacked, but also southern customs, family life, and morals, there was distinct resentment, which ripened into hate after the slave rebellions.

The first violent effort to free the slaves was launched in Baltimore at the first national conference of Methodist leaders in 1780, and was thereafter kept going hotly. This was abetted by the Presbyterian Synod in 1787. The Baptists became active and shortly thereafter the Congregationalists at their Hartford convention added slavery to the vices of "profanity, Sabbath breaking, use of intoxicating drinks, covetousness, gambling, breaches of the Seventh Commandment, attendance upon the theater, dancing, gayety and extravagance in dress, novel reading, and sleeping in church." It is interesting to note that the southern planter had been indicted for almost all of these crimes against Heaven before Congregationalist action was taken against slavery.

We have reason to believe that early abolitionists thought southern gentlemen were having too easy a time of it sipping toddies and having oriental relations with the females of the toilers while the negroes did the work. Back of all the northern dislike of the southerner's aristocracy was rancor because the latter had the means to be aristocratic in habits, tastes, and pleasures. It was not North against South, for sectionally the North was much more wealthy, but individual bluenose against southern cavalier. In some cases this feeling was naïvely expressed, as in The New Revolution, a speech before the American Antislavery Society in 1857 by Thomas Wentworth Higginson:

"The reason why free-State and slave-State men hate each other in Kansas is because all the institutions of their respective nations [sic] have for years been training them to hate each other * * * it is only the old hostility. * * * It is not only the difference in birth, although the Puritan stock remains upon the one side and the cavalier stock upon the other. * * * You may know the one side from the other because the one side wears long hair and the other does not."

While the North's hay crop alone represented as many dollars as all the southern agricultural products, the South had three times as many exports; and the money accrued neither to the slaves nor hillbillies, but was concentrated in the hands of less than one-twentieth of the South's total population. The North produced more than twice as much from the land—with only two-thirds the laborers—and industrially and financially the North was far ahead. It used five times as much private capital, although there came a distinct rub in the fact that this capital represented much money from southern banks, for the bank capital of the North was only twice that of the South.

As seen by the excessively smaller number of men on the farms, the North had already learned the vastly more efficient system of hired workers; and though industrially it produced five times as much as the South, it employed only four times as many men in the factories. The South was waking up to the merits of wage slavery when its progress in this line was blocked by the efforts of abolition propaganda.

There were moneyed men, needless to say, in the North; but they did not appear so aristocratic and enviable to their laboring constituency because of two things: In the first place, they had no real talent for ease and luxury; and in the second place and partially in consequence, their earnings went into an expansion which knows a far larger place in industry than in agriculture. Besides the northern preacher could not attack the northern man of wealth with impunity. Nor was there the incentive. The northern man of wealth was staid and a churchgoer, while the southerner coruscated and went to the race track and theater.

Besides the South's capital there was enormous wealth represented in the slaves themselves. In 1850 the slaves numbered 3,200,000. Their average value was about $400 or $500 each, although the abolitionists rated them all at the price of a good field hand, or $1,000 each.

How may we account for the atrocity stories spread by abolitionists of the planter's physical cruelty to the slaves? In the first place, it is a mistake to assume that the southern planters treated the blacks worse than they did their horses and cattle, except in the matter of passing restrictive laws—following the slave insurrections—against certain negro activities wherein the activities might differ from those of the other livestock. But the South had other laws. Louisiana, for instance, said that slave mother and child—10 years or under—might not be separated on pain of a fine of from $1,000 to $2,000 and imprisonment of six months to one year, and forfeiture of the slave.

Alabama had a similar law. Virginia said (Fitzhugh et ux. v. Foot et al., 3 Vall's Va. Rept. 13) that separation of mother and child was a thing "which humanity forbids, and will not be countenanced in a court of equity." Maryland forbade the separation of legal husband and wife in slavery; and even Georgia, the worst of the slave States, had strict laws against cruelty.

These things were ignored by such writers as Harriet Beecher Stowe, and the whole range of abolitionist books and pamphlets is filled with outrage stories. Thousands of poor people in northern cities were in a plight far more desperate than that of the slaves whose masters were forced by law to feed them well, not overwork them, but give them medical attention, clothe them, and furnish them lodging.

Maryland as early as 1715 (laws of 1715, ch. 44) stipulated a fine of 1,000 pounds of tobacco for cruelty, excessive labor, insufficient food, drink, lodging, or clothing, or for insufficient rest or sleep; and later forbade slaves being worked on Sunday, which rule prevailed all over the South, as did laws against cruelty or impoverishing treatment. Indeed, many States provided (Kentucky, for instance; Morehead & Brown's Digest, Frankfort, 1834) that the master be deprived of his slaves at forced sale if he treated them cruelly or did not take care of their wants.

Louisiana said (Markham v. Close, Sept. T. 1831, 2 Louisiana Rept. 581, Porter, J.): "Infliction of cruel punishment on the slave by his master is a criminal offense and must be punished by a criminal prosecution and not before a civil tribunal." (The slave did not have to bring suit to obtain relief.)

Georgia (Cobb's Digest, Athens, Ga., 1851, p. 971), in an act of May 10, 1770, limited by "positive laws the extent of power of the owners of slaves * * * and owners or persons having the care and management of slaves" from exercising "excessive and unnecessary rigor or wanton cruelty." Murder of a slave (December 3, 1799, sec. 2) was to merit "the same mode of prosecution and measure of punishment" as for killing a white man—a law that held true in all Southern States. In 1832, by the act of December 24, Georgia provided and established an infirmary for the relief and protection of aged and afflicted negroes and provided that masters could no more escape the cost of slave upkeep in the institution than they could evade taxes on their land.

South Carolina (1 Nott and McCord's S. C. Rept. 182 Per. Cur. Colcock, J.) held that "a slave who is merely flying away can not be killed" except by the master or pursuer in an act of self defense.

I might go on quoting statutes and decisions endlessly to show that there was a wide range of protection for the negro—and be hauled up by some astute person inquiring how the laws and statutes were interpreted and enforced. This is a pertinent question, for in going over some thousand decisions I have found a number of cases wherein the jurists either did not know the law or purposely misconstrued it to the benefit of the slave owner rather than the slave, but the latter cases occur with greatest frequency after the slave insurrection crisis of 1831, while on the other hand there are a large number of cases which show such a startling liberality of the jurists so favoring the slaves that their decisions were equally bad law.

In Virginia, for instance (Souther v. the Commonwealth), an eminent and humane jurist with a real sense of values got into bad law because he ruled: "The killing of a slave by his master and owner, by willful and excessive whipping, is murder in the first degree, though it may not have been the purpose and intention of the master and owner to kill the slave." Here is plainly faulty law—though sound sense—and the jury did rightly (in the legal sense) in bringing a verdict of manslaughter, with a minimum penalty of five years. However, the intent of fairness on the part of the judge is evident.

Cruelty, when one considers the number of slaves, was extremely rare, and actual cases were so infrequent that they altogether escaped the notice of the abolitionists, who were forced to invent such cases. It was in general in the South a despicable social misbehavior to mistreat slaves, and not only to mistreat them but to sell them "down river." The slaves in the border States, eating masters out of house and home, were very often manumitted rather than sold. Maryland, in 1850, had 74,000 free negroes—more by 20,000 than any free State.

Most of the abolition stories of cruelty appear now to be foolish. As I have shown, by comparison of northern and southern products, the slave was not worked as hard as the hired laborer—chiefly because the slave and his family did not face starvation either by indigence or competition—but stories were told by abolitionists to the effect that planters hitched slaves to plows, despite the fact that it would take six healthy field hands worth $1,000 each to do the work of one horse worth $100. Almost every abolition story, in fact, must be taken with a grain of Epsom salts. The great bulk of the cruelty stories were pure fabrications, sans names, dates, and locale. I have chased hundreds of these tales to earth, and of authentic cases of cruelty I have found not a dozen. These the abolitionists used over and over again, sometimes almost 50 years after the act.

One finds, for instance, the Rev. John Rankin, in a series of letters to his brother, Thomas, published in The Liberator during the year 1832, quoting a case of cruelty, sent second hand to him by the Rev. William Dickey, of Bloomingburg, Ohio. The case was authentic. Lilburn Lewis and his brother, Isham, said to be nephews of Thomas Jefferson, planters in the county of Livingston, Ky., cut off the feet and legs of a living slave and burned the members before the slave's eyes, afterwards dispatching him and burning the rest of the body. What Rankin neglected to mention and what Dickey neglected to mention, when he used the material over again in the American Anti-Slavery Society's report of 1839, was that the business happened back in 1811; that Lilburn Lewis committed suicide to escape trial and that Isham was sentenced to hang for the crime. Thus both Rankin and Dickey gave the impression that the South tolerated such things, and by their omission of the date gave the appearance of freshness and everyday occurence to the business, whereas the Lewis brothers were plainly men of the Loeb-Leopold type and were quickly brought to dock.

Rankin used this material over and over again; from his pulpit, then in The Liberator, before the American Anti-Slavery Society, and in a volume of his "letters."

One other authentic case of cruelty, also committed by a mental degenerate, was that of Madame La Loire (sometimes reported as Madame Laurie) in New Orleans, who beat and mauled a number of slaves and chained them in a room to die. This happened in the year 1834, and the whole South was outraged by the affair. Nevertheless it was held against the South by the abolitionists. We find the Rev. Philo Tower of the Genesee Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in his Slavery Unmasked, a book published in 1856, reciting the affair as if it had just happened, and, moreover reporting it as practically first hand, plagiarizing word for word from the American Anti-Slavery Society's report of 1839, which, curiously, repeated verbatim the account from the New Orleans Mercantile Advertiser—except that Tower withheld Madame La Loire's name. Mrs. Lydia Maria Child used the story in her intemperate Anti-Slavery Catechism.

In the main, the authentic documents used by the abolitionists were confined to advertisements from southern newspapers listing runaway slaves and naming their various distinguishing marks and scars—such marks and scars as often adorn the free negro of to-day. Yet the United States census of 1850 shows that only one-thirtieth of 1 per cent of the slaves annually ran away with any idea of staying away permanently, and the census for 1860 shows a reduction to one-fiftieth of 1 per cent. Fully a third of these runaways were chronic offenders. In 1850, for instance, out of 3,204,313 slaves only 1,011 were fugitives, while 1,467 were voluntarily freed by their masters. The number of manumitted slaves up until 1831 was always many times that of the fugitives—a fact not mentioned by the abolitionists.

The South has never, so far as the histories are concerned (even her own), had a fair and truthful statement about the real causes of the Civil War nor of the institution of slavery; nor were the lies about cruelty ever nailed. (Reprinted by request from McNaught's Magazine. Two more articles from the same series will appear in early issues of Plain Talk.)

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, there has been some talk of the solid South being broken; there has been some talk to the effect that if a certain person were nominated for President of the United States the South, which has always stood for white supremacy, placing it above every other consideration almost, except possibly the Christian religion, might support the Republican ticket. In the South we believe that white supremacy is a part of the Christian religion, that the white people are superior to negroes, and we never expect under any conditions or circumstances to permit social equality in that section of the country; but, Mr. President, if such a condition as has been produced at Anderson, S. C., by one Mr. Harry S. New is continued, and if such a policy as has been started by Mr. Herbert Hoover is to be put in operation, those who have been sleeping in their beds at night and waking up in the morning with the happy thought that the South will ever have a respectable Republican Party had just as well go back to bed and stay there, because no such condition will ever arise.

Just after the Civil War there came into the State of South Carolina a set of scalawags and they were imported into the entire South. They appealed to the negro vote, as Herbert Hoover has done in this instance; they humiliated white women and white men until the red shirt of Democracy arose and drove them from their borders.

A few weeks ago the Republican administration took a citizen of Savannah, Ga., imported him into the State of South Carolina, and appointed him acting postmaster of the city of Anderson. A protest was made to the Post Office Department and to the President of the United States, but nothing was done. Finally, Mr. President, it was proven to them beyond a shadow of a doubt that this man was a citizen of Savannah, Ga., a fact which was sworn to by himself, as will be found in his affidavit on page 3249 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 20, 1928, where this man swore as follows:

I further swear that I reside in the city of Savannah at No. 220 East Forty-fifth Street, or in the fourth district, G. M.; my age is 26; my occupation is none.

No occupation. There is his own affidavit, signed and sworn to, and, as I have stated, it will be found on page 3249 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Monday, February 20, and it is dated April 1, 1927, one year ago exactly.

After that affidavit was called to the attention of the President of the United States and the Post Office Department, it was currently rumored, and I am informed to-day that it is the purpose of the Post Office Department to keep this man in that post office as acting postmaster until he becomes a citizen of South Carolina, and then to appoint him postmaster.

That, Mr. President, along with Hoover's action with his "black chocolates," is exactly what put the Republican Party in disrepute in the South and made the very name Republican a stench in the nostrils of all decent white people. Is that to continue? It is continuing.

Mr. President, I wrote a letter to the Civil Service Commission, and the answer which came to me is based upon as false a premise as ever a letter was written upon. When I asked the Civil Service Commission about this matter—I have here the letters—they made an investigation. Here is Doctor Doyle's letter, in which he says that they have discovered that this man was not a resident of South Carolina. Notwithstanding that fact, however, and notwithstanding the rules of the department that no man shall be appointed to a post office unless he has resided for two years at the place where the post office to which he is to be appointed is located and has received his mail at that post office they put him in there and keep him there.

It is said:

We have made an examination. Now we have had notices posted that we are going to hold an examination for postmaster.

But they are holding that examination back for the purpose of letting this man become a citizen of South Carolina.

Mr. President, the constitution of South Carolina is very plain on the subject. I wish to read just a line. Here is what constitutes a citizen of South Carolina:

Residence in the State for two years, in the county one year, in the polling precinct in which the elector offers to vote four months, and the payment six months before any election of any poll tax then due and payable.

The rules of the Post Office Department themselves are being openly and flagrantly violated to-day by President Coolidge and his Postmaster General by putting this man, a citizen of Georgia, into a post office at Anderson, S. C., and keeping him there. Why? Because, as I am informed, the patronage boss of South Carolina has been told that this man will do his part in the payment of money for the Republican campaign fund.

In passing I might state that just a few days ago a rural carrier in my State was approached by a negro delegate to the approaching Kansas City Republican convention and told that if he did not help pay the expenses of that delegate to the convention he would lose his job. The rural carrier told him he would be damned if he would do it, and in five days after that he lost his job, and is out of his job to-day. I can prove that at any time the Post Office Department or Mr. Coolidge wants the proof. I myself will pay the man's way here to prove it, if that be necessary.

I wrote a number of letters in regard to this matter. What answer do I get?

We are having an examination made but it will take us several weeks—to settle the question.

Several weeks—

They have been three months now in an effort, as they claim, to settle it. They can not settle it, because one Joseph W. Tolbert, or his agents—and Harry New knows it, and Attorney General Sargent knows it, because I told him so to his face—is receiving money from the postmasters in South Carolina, possibly not for his own use; and that is how they are holding their jobs. I hope the resolution which has been offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] will be adopted by the Senate, and I hope the scope of the investigation proposed by that resolution will be broadened so as to include South Carolina.

In my reply to a letter which I wrote to Mr. Everett Sanders, he wrote me from the President's office a beautiful dodge.

I want to read first a letter written by John H. Bartlett:

DEAR MR. SANDERS: Senator BLEASE, it would seem, must be laboring under some misapprehension of fact in this case. I get this impression from Senator MOSES, with whom I talked this morning.

The truth is that when the postmaster died on December 27, 1927, it seemed to be the proper thing to do in the emergency to appoint his son acting postmaster.

This was a boy whose father and mother separated when he was a little boy. The mother took the son and went to Savannah, Ga., and I do not think he often saw the father afterwards. The boy lived in Savannah with his mother, went to school in Savannah, made Savannah his home, and possibly went to Anderson two or three times in his entire lifetime to visit his father. Even when his father was down on his sick bed he did not go to see him, so I am informed; but after he died this boy was imported by Harry S. New and Calvin Coolidge from Savannah, Ga., to Anderson, S. C., like they did in the days of the scalawags and the thieves, and made a postmaster in my State.

and this was done on recommendation of National Committeeman Tolbert. A civil-service examination is being held—

That was absolutely not true, and the records of Doyle's office and Bartlett's office both show that no such examination was held or has been held.

Now, listen to this:

The son is ineligible for the examination under the civil-service rule, being under 30 years of age, which is the civil-service requirement in this class of office.

The rule as to nonresidence has never been held to apply to an acting postmaster. * * *

But this young man, about 27 years of age, was born and brought up in the town of Anderson—

That is as black a lie as ever was written on a typewriter, if John H. Bartlett did sign it—and I think he claims it as his residence.

Yet, Mr. President, while he thinks he claims it as his residence, here is the man's affidavit, sworn to in April, 1927, just about six months before he was appointed postmaster at Anderson, in which he swears that he was a resident of the city of Savannah, Ga.; gives the number of the house and the street where he lives, and says his occupation is "none." Bartlett knew that when he wrote that letter, because I had so informed him; and yet he puts his name here to something which he knows was a falsehood, and I will prove it by his own records directly.

He is unmarried, as I understand it—

A man who had no occupation ought to have been unmarried, I certainly think; he deserved to be—and has for a few years been getting his living in other parts.

If he had been getting his living in other parts, how could he be a resident of Anderson?

He may be a resident of Georgia, but, as I said before—

Listen, now—

he came home upon the death of his father—

Just as I said; he came to see his dead body put away and get the job—and it was quite natural that he should pick up the post-office situation that his father was in and go along with it temporarily.

Quite natural! In the case of a man from another State, who has been gone from his father for years, had not lived with him since his babyhood, it was "quite natural" that he should come out of another State and go into your State or my State and be appointed postmaster! I suppose if the postmaster at Portland, Me., had a son down in Florida, who had not seen him in 20 years, 5 years past 21 years of age, and the postmaster up in Maine should die, and this boy from Florida should go to see his daddy buried, he should be appointed postmaster in Maine! Yes; you would see Calvin Coolidge making a southerner postmaster in Maine!

He says:

I think Senator BLEASE will see this situation and accept it.

I will accept it, Mr. President, just like the South suffered such actions as this in the face of Federal bayonets in a Yankee camp. I will never submit to it as long as I can help it, and my people are not going always to submit to it. They are very long-suffering; they will suffer a long time, and they will go a long way; but there is a time to stop, and that time may come; and, if it does, Calvin Coolidge and Harry S. New will be responsible for its coming.

Since his appointment as acting postmaster, we have gotten telegrams from the mayor of the city * * * asking that he be made the permanent postmaster.

The mayor of the city! The mayor of the city married a sister of the dead postmaster, who is the own uncle of this boy. A nice recommendation, from his own uncle! He happened to be mayor of the city of Anderson, and he asked this boy from Savannah to be brought over there, I suspect to keep his mother from having to keep him, as he says he was a loafer, "occupation, none," he swears; 27 years of age. That is his recommendation—his uncle, the mayor.

Mr. President, further, Mr. Bartlett says:

The civil service list should be out in a very few weeks, and it doesn't seem reasonable on the facts to put the son of the deceased postmaster out as acting postmaster and put another in.

I trust this is a satisfactory explanation, but if it is thought that we should change him as acting postmaster in view of the situation, we can readily do so.

I wrote back and asked them to do so; and the result has been that they have kept him there nearly the four months required for being a resident of the ward in which he lives, hoping to keep him there until the Senate adjourns, and hold him in there until next December, when his year will be up, and then claim that he is eligible, and make him the permanent postmaster.

Herbert Hoover, from England, with his monocle, will never break the solid South by putting "chocolate drops" in the same water-closet with young white girls, nor will Harry New do it by bringing people from other States into the Southern States to hold their offices.

You gentlemen kicked this Georgia judge out down here, or you would have kicked him out—they pulled him out to keep you from doing it—when they imported him into Georgia to make a judge out of him. Now, why should they import a man out of Georgia into my State, and give him one of the finest positions in it, when we have right in that town plenty of people who are thoroughly competent to take it, and it might be possible that they could find one of their own kind?

Mr. President, I wrote to the President of the United States in regard to this matter. I do not care to take up the time of the Senate to read all these letters, but I do want to give here the substance of my reply to my friend Mr. Bartlett:

This letter of February 14, to the Hon. Everett Sanders, Secretary to the President, was handed me upon my return from South Carolina. It is really amusing, and I might say, but I won't, shows a thorough ignorance of the facts in the Anderson postmaster situation.

John R. Cochran, who was postmaster at Anderson, and died recently, was born and reared in Anderson, S. C. He married a Georgia woman. For some reason—I do not care to go into details—he and his wife were separated and did not live together for years before his death. Neither were they living together at the time of his death.

She went back to her people in Savannah, Ga., and carried young John Cochran, the now acting postmaster, as a child with her. He was reared in Savannah, lived and schooled and worked in Savannah. I have two oaths made and signed by him that he was a citizen of Savannah and a registered voter there, having registered in 1924 and again in April, 1927.

See page 3249, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, February 20, 1928.

He swears in these affidavits that he is a citizen of Savannah. I hope he is not a perjurer, but if he is not a citizen of Savannah he is a perjurer, according to his own two signed and sworn statements.

He had not been in Anderson for some time before the death of his father and only went there upon being informed that his father was dead; and while there was picked up and made postmaster, which I consider an outrage upon the people of Anderson and the State of South Carolina.

I suppose from this letter that if a man was postmaster in New York and had a son living in California, and the New York postmaster died and the son went over to see his daddy buried, he ought to be picked up and made postmaster. I do not see it that way, General.

Now, as a matter of fact, the Civil Service Commission has found that Cochran is not a resident of Anderson and has not received any mail there in the last three or four years, if ever, and they have reported him ineligible even to take the examination, so where is the claim that he is a citizen of Anderson?

This letter says: "It seems to be the proper thing to appoint his son as acting postmaster," notwithstanding the fact that his son was a voting citizen and resident of another State.

The letter says, "He claims he is a resident." How can he so claim this, with the two affidavits hereto attached, swearing that he is a citizen of Savannah and getting registration certificates to vote there?

The next statement is laughable: "He came home upon the death of his father, and it was quite natural that he should pick up the post office. * * *"

The letter says you have a telegram from the mayor of the city, saying he will make a good postmaster. The mayor of the city is his uncle.

Now, Mr. President, it is common talk around that town, and I believe it, that the Post Office Department is endeavoring, as I have said, to hold this man there until he becomes a citizen. I introduced in the Senate a resolution upon this very question. I introduced in the Senate a bill upon this question. The bill is in the Post Office Committee, I suppose, quietly laid away. The resolution, I suppose, is somewhere in the same condition; but I did not propose to sit here longer and allow this man to sit in that post office as acting postmaster without calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that the President of the United States and the Postmaster General of the United States are both violating the laws of the Nation, as stated by the departments themselves, in holding a man in this post office in violation of two of the principal rules of the department.

Mr. President, this is not a personal matter. I do not know this boy, and have nothing in the world against him. He may be all right. I am fighting the principle involved. This situation was not brought about by me, and therefore, whatever the result of it may be, the blame must fall where it belongs, on the party attempting to humiliate my State by importing a man from another State to hold office in it.

Mr. President, as I said, I do not care to take up the time of the Senate; but I ask permission to have published in the RECORD certain letters and telegrams which passed between myself and the Postmaster General and the President of the United States, and letters which they wrote me in reference to this matter, in order that the entire situation may be fairly and clearly understood, together with two newspaper clippings and two documents relating to the same subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COUZENS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 5, 1928.

Hon. HARRY S. NEW,
Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GENERAL: I am inclosing you copies of some telegrams which is evidence that John R. Cochran, just named by you as acting postmaster at Anderson, S. C., is a citizen and a registered voter of the city of Savannah and the State of Georgia, and not a citizen or a resident or even a taxpayer in the city of Anderson, the county of Anderson, or the State of South Carolina, and I request that you withdraw his appointment as acting postmaster, as I most seriously protest the transporting from another State a man into my State to fill such office.

With my kindest regards,
Very respectfully,

COLE L. BLEASE.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 5, 1928.

Hon. HARRY S. NEW,
Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR GENERAL: Further in reference to appointment of John R. Cochran as postmaster at Anderson, S. C., I am reliably informed that Mr. Cochran was in the insurance business in Savannah, Ga., for several years up to a very recent date; that before he went to Savannah he had made his home in Alabama and Maryland. I would like to know if it is going to be the policy of the department to take citizens from other States and appoint them postmasters in South Carolina. I would like to have a positive and definite answer on this question, as I am frank to say that if such is the purpose, I propose, as a member of the Senate Post Offices and Post Roads Committee, to introduce a bill prohibiting such tactics. South Carolina suffered a long time from scalawag and carpetbaggers and I do not propose to see that history repeated if I can prevent it.

With my kindest regards,
Very respectfully,

COLE L. BLEASE.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 7, 1928.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR BLEASE: With further reference to our telephone conversation concerning the appointment of an acting postmaster at Anderson, S. C., I would state that the circumstances are as follows:

The postmaster at Anderson, John R. Cochran, died, making it necessary to appoint an acting postmaster at once. Mr. John R. Cochran, jr., the son of the postmaster, was recommended and was named as acting postmaster until such time as an examination conducted by the Civil Service Commission and inquiry by the Postmaster General might develop a proper person to name for the regular appointment. Young Mr. Cochran was notified to this effect and his bond sent to him.

It was not until after all this had been done that the case was brought to my attention, which was by your call over the telephone. The matter had arisen and pursued the regular course as a matter of routine and exactly as such cases are always treated. Immediately following your conversation I asked the First Assistant's bureau the status of affairs and learned that Mr. Cochran's bond had already been sent to him in order that he might take charge of the office. It was, of course, obviously necessary that some one must be placed in charge.

I also wrote to Mr. Joe W. Tolbert telling him of your telephone call to me. I am this morning in receipt of a number of telegrams addressed to the Postmaster General, one of which is from the mayor of Anderson, Mr. Foster Fant, which I quote:

"The citizens of Anderson heartily approve the appointment John R. Cochran postmaster.

"FOSTER FANT, Mayor."

Also one from Wilton E. Hall, editor Anderson Daily Independent, which I also quote:

"As editor of Democratic newspaper here, I respectfully indorse the nomination of John Cochran, jr., for postmaster at Anderson, S. C. Although he has been away from this city attending college and touring Europe and working in other cities, he has always regarded Anderson as home and his forebears maternally and paternally have been native Andersonians back to the sixth generation. Andersonians prefer Cochran over and above any Republican here. Local post office organization and 90 per cent of patrons of office would indorse Cochran, in my opinion. I trust you will present nomination of Cochran."

You will, of course, understand that this department not only does not want to appoint some one who is not a citizen as postmaster at any given point but, in fact, that it can not do so under the law which requires two years' residence within the delivery limits of a post office to make a man eligible for appointment. The question of an individual's residence is one that would be determined by the Civil Service Commission in examining the qualifications of applicants for appointment.

Before the matter had been brought to my attention at all it had reached the point where Mr. Cochran had, in the due and regular course of departmental procedure, been designated to have temporary charge of the office at Anderson.

It is understood that this matter is temporary and nothing more. An examination will be asked for at the hands of the Civil Service Commission, which it will be asked to expedite, and no appointment of a postmaster can be made except as the result of this examination. You will be given every opportunity to express your opinions and desires with reference to the regular appointment.

I regret that you did not bring the subject to my attention earlier, but I trust that the foregoing explanation will be satisfactory.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY S. NEW, Postmaster General.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 9, 1928.

Hon. HARRY S. NEW,
Postmaster General, Post Office Department,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GENERAL: You and I have been too good friends to fall out over a small post office or, in fact, anything else, and we are not going to fall out, and the little difference between us about the Anderson post office can, I think, be pleasantly settled; but I call your attention to some matters which possibly you have not thought of.

If an attempt is made to appoint a person, totally disqualified, either as acting postmaster or postmaster, and he takes charge of the office, is he responsible for his acts while he is disqualified and ineligible?

If a person totally disqualified gives bond, can he take the oath of office without committing perjury, and is his bond legal; and could he and his bondsmen be held liable if there should be irregularities?

Can a person, absolutely disqualified under the statutes of the United States, hold an office and exercise the duties thereof, even though he is commissioned to do so by the properly legally constituted authorities? For instance, suppose that the governor of a State, in case of a vacancy in the United States Senate, were to commission a man under 30 years of age, could he take the oath of office? Is he a United States Senator, although he held a commission of the governor? Mr. VARE, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. Smith, of Illinois, have commissions as United States Senators, but they are not.

Did Mr. Cochran, at Anderson, take an oath before he assumed his duties as postmaster? If so, did he swear that he was a citizen of Anderson?

Is it a fact that since his attempted appointment he has applied for registration in the county of Anderson and has been refused because he can not take the required oath?

It is said that intent governs in these matters. True. But acts seem to me to show intention better than words, and this young man freely, voluntarily, and without compulsion, dread, fear, or threat, registered in the city of Savannah, Ga., exercised his citizenship and suffrage in that State, and when he left there in 1927 went to the State of Alabama and took charge of a bottling plant.

Does that look like that he intended to make South Carolina his home? And doesn't it show that he intended to change only after his father's death, and then because he wanted his father's position? He went to Anderson only to the funeral, where he has not been for years past except occasionally on a visit.

I call these matters to your attention, hoping that you will not let this young man stay in that post office, and, if you do, his individuality in the matter is going to be a small item in comparison to the political situation that it is going to create not only in South Carolina but here in Washington, D. C.

I assure you again of my kindest regards and best wishes.

Very respectfully,

COLE L. BLEASE.

P. S.—It might not be amiss for me to call your attention to the fact that the mayor of Anderson is an uncle of Cochran, and could hardly be expected not to indorse him, regardless of politics, and possibly he did not know that Cochran was a registered citizen and voter of Savannah, Ga.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 11, 1928.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am very glad indeed to have your letter of the 9th. I again assure you that I have every disposition to ultimately adjust the matter of the Anderson postmastership in a manner that will be satisfactory to you.

There was certainly no reason for this department to do otherwise than to proceed upon the theory that the son of the man who had been a long-time postmaster at Anderson was in all respects qualified to carry on the office. The death of the postmaster made it necessary to put the office under some one's management temporarily at once and the matter had progressed beyond the stage where it could be stopped before I had your letter. An examination for the creation of a list of eligibles has already been asked for at the hands of the Civil Service Commission and the time for closing applications fixed at February 7. When we get this list we can proceed to a permanent adjustment.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY S. NEW, Postmaster General.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 13, 1928.

Hon. WILLIAM C. DEMING, President, Hon. GEORGE R. WALES, and Hon. JESSIE DELL, Commissioners,

Civil Service Commission, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: Mr. John R. Cochran, who has just been appointed acting postmaster at Anderson, S. C., is not a resident of the city of Anderson and is only 27 years of age. I presume he will be a candidate for the office, as I notice you have called for applications to be filed on or before February 7, 1928.

I am writing this to call your particular attention to the fact:

First. That the law requires that a man shall be 30 years of age to hold a post office like that at Anderson Court House, S. C. Mr. Cochran is only 27.

Second. That the law requires that a man shall be a resident of the town in which he is to be postmaster for two years previous to the time of his taking charge and must receive his mail there.

Mr. Cochran is a registered voter in the city of Savannah, Ga., and does not, and has not at any time received any mail at the Anderson post office, except possibly when he was there on a visit to his father.

I am inclosing proof of these assertions and, upon examination, I have not any idea that the young man would deny the facts.

Now, it may be said to you that Mr. Cochran was born and reared in Anderson and while he was temporarily away he held this as his home. My information is that this is not true. John R. Cochran, this boy's father, and his wife separated. His wife moved to Savannah, Ga. The boy went with his mother and did not live with his father but did occasionally pay visits to his father's people in Anderson. His father begged him, I understand, to come and live with him and prepare himself to be his successor. The boy flatly declined to do so, but remained away from Anderson.

Therefore I take the position that the young man is in no way qualified legally for this position, and I most seriously protest against his name being certified in the eligible list.

If you wish to go further into this matter, I would be glad if you will allow me to cross-examine the young man in the presence of your commission.

Of course, I need not say that if he is appointed I shall make every effort within my power to prevent his confirmation; not that I have anything against the young man whatever, personally; I do not even know him; but I do not propose to allow the law to be flagrantly violated without a protest and a man brought out of another State and appointed to a post office in my State.

I am mailing a copy of this to each of you gentlemen and a copy to your clerk. I have absolutely no objection to your mailing a copy, if you see fit, to young Cochran.

Very respectfully,

COLE L. BLEASE.

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., January 14, 1928.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR BLEASE: Your letter to each of the three civil service commissioners with respect to the forthcoming examination at Anderson, S. C., has been received.

The closing date for the examination at Anderson is February 7, 1928. This is a first-class post office, paying a salary of $3,400 per annum. No applications have as yet been filed with the Civil Service Commission.

Applicants for this position are required to be 30 years of age, except that all age limits are waived for ex-service men who served in the World War or Spanish-American War and were honorably discharged. Applicants must have actually resided within the delivery of the office for two years next preceding the date of examination.

Your letter will be filed with the application division, and the question concerning Mr. Cochran will be carefully scrutinized if he files an application.

Very truly yours,

W. C. DEMING, President.

South Carolina: Anderson, $3,400; December 27, 1927.

No person who has passed his sixty-fifth birthday or who has not actually resided within the delivery of such office for two years next preceding the date of examination shall be given the examination herein provided for. The Postmaster General shall determine before sending a name to the President that the candidate so selected has continued to reside within the delivery of the post office since the examination and up to the time of such selection.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 21, 1928.

His Excellency CALVIN COOLIDGE,

President of the United States,

The White House, Washington, D. C.

HONORED SIR: A few days ago Mr. John R. Cochran, the postmaster at Anderson, S. C., died. Shortly thereafter the Post Office Department designated Jack R. Cochran acting postmaster.

I am inclosing records to show that the said Jack R. Cochran, or J. R. Cochran, is not qualified to act in said capacity, and that he is now acting in violation of the laws of the United States and the postal rules of the United States:

First. Because he is only between 26 and 27 years of age; the law requiring that this position should be held by persons not less than 30 years of age.

Second. That he is a resident and voter in the city of Savannah, in the State of Georgia, having resided there most of his life at the home of his uncle, at 220 East Forty-fifth Street.

Third. That he has not at any time had his mail addressed to him at the Anderson, S. C., post office.

In support of this I am sending you a copy of two certificates sworn to by himself, showing that he is a registered voter of the city of Savannah, in the State of Georgia; also copy of certificates from the officials of that city as to his having registered there and being a voter there. His own affidavit shows that when he registered in 1927 that he was several years below the required age to be qualified for this postmastership.

The constitution of the State of South Carolina requires that a man must have resided in the State for two years, that he must have resided in the county one year, and he must have resided in the voting precinct four months before he is eligible to become an elector.

Mr. Cochran's own affidavits, herewith attached, show that he lived in the city of Savannah, certainly up to the 1st of April, 1927. I am informed that he then went not to South Carolina but to Florida and then to Alabama, as other certificates herewith inclosed will show.

In view of this situation, Mr. President, I am protesting against the bringing of a man from Savannah, Ga., to Anderson, S. C., and making him postmaster.

I dislike to refer to family matters, but Postmaster John R. Cochran, deceased, and his wife were separated, and this boy left Anderson and went to Savannah, Ga., to live with his mother, and remained there at his uncle's home, went to school in the Savannah schools, registered, and became a voter in Savannah, has never lived in Anderson, S. C., and did not come to Anderson, S. C., until notified of his father's death, and while there was illegally and without excuse or foundation of law appointed acting postmaster simply because he was the son of his father, and I do not believe, sir, that you will uphold such action on the part of those who made this appointment.

I have called the matter to the attention of the Postmaster General and also to the Civil Service Board, and sent them copies of the papers which I am inclosing to you. I request that this young man be relieved from this service and that a native, at least, of my State be appointed to that office.

I regret that I have to make this letter so long, but I feel that it is due, before I bring the matter before the Senate, to place it before you for such action as you may deem fit.

With my kindest regards,

Very respectfully,

COLE L. BLEASE.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 21, 1928.

Hon. HARRY S. NEW,

Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GENERAL: I am inclosing you copies of registration certificate of John R. Cochran, now acting postmaster at Anderson, S. C., sworn to by him, showing that on April 1, 1927, he was a registered voter, resident, and citizen of Savannah, Ga., and was only 26 years of age at that time, which shows that he is legally disqualified of even acting postmaster at Anderson, S. C., because he is not 30 years of age and is not now and never has been a citizen of Anderson, S. C.

Very respectfully,

COLE L. BLEASE.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 21, 1928.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,

MY DEAR SENATOR BLEASE: Your letter of January 21, inclosing copies of registration certificate of John R. Cochran, acting postmaster at Anderson, S. Very truly yours,

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 24, 1928.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR BLEASE: In the Postmaster General's absence I am acknowledging receipt of your letter of January 21 relating to the post office at Anderson, S. C. The letter will be brought to the Postmaster General's attention at the first opportunity.

You referred to the age of Mr. John R. Cochran as being 26 years, whereas in order to take an examination for postmaster at a first-class office a candidate must be 30 years of age. If Mr. Cochran is not 30, and if he has had no military service, it is therefore evident that he will be unable to qualify from the standpoint of age in the examination which has been announced for February 7. The requirement as to age is not applicable in the case of an ex-service man.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN H. BARTLETT,
Acting Postmaster General.

CITY OF SAVANNAH, GA.,

Savannah, Ga., January 25, 1928.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,

MY DEAR SIR: Replying to your favor of the 20th instant, asking for information of Jack R. or J. R. Cochran, I find that the gentleman is now in Anderson, S. C., and is acting postmaster at that point.

Yours very truly,

G. B. PRITCHARD,
City Treasurer.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 9, 1928.

Hon. HARRY S. NEW,
Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GENERAL: I am informed by the Civil Service Commission that Mr. John R. Cochran, now acting postmaster at Anderson, has been declared ineligible, not being a resident of the city or county of Anderson or State of South Carolina, as provided.

I am also informed that he is three years under the required age and had no war record, save that he served in a Reserve Officers' Training Corps for a few weeks.

Under these conditions I am writing to ask if it is right that he should remain longer as acting postmaster; being wholly and totally disqualified to act as postmaster, should he be allowed to serve as acting postmaster, being a native of another State than the one in which he is acting, and being three years under the required age? I will be glad if you will give this matter your attention.

It is reported also that it is probable that an attempt will be made to hold him in the post office as acting postmaster until he shall become of age and shall have lived within the county and State the required time.

I can not believe this rumor; however, it is being very generally circulated as a fact by people who seem to be within the circle handling such affairs.

Thanking you for your attention to this matter, I am

Very respectfully,

COLE L. BLEASE.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 11, 1928.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR BLEASE: In the absence of the Postmaster General I desire to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 9th instant, relative to Mr. John R. Cochran, now acting postmaster at Anderson, S. C.

The Civil Service Commission announced that applications to fill the vacancy in the postmastership at Anderson must be filed by the close of business on the 7th instant. As soon as a certification is received the question of appointing a postmaster therefrom will have prompt attention. It is not believed advisable to appoint another acting postmaster at this time in view of the fact a list of eligibles will undoubtedly be secured within a reasonable time and then an appointment can be made for a four-year term.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN H. BARTLETT,
Acting Postmaster General.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 13, 1928.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR BLEASE: Reference is made to your letter of January 20 in regard to J. R. Cochran.

Records of the North Georgia Agricultural College show John Robert Cochran to have been a member of the R. O. T. C. and S. A. T. C. at that institution from September, 1917, to June, 1919; that he completed 490 hours' work for military credit to June 9, 1919, and completed 2 years of military training, attended the R. O. T. C. Camp at Camp Lee, Va., June 21 to August 2, 1919, and successfully completed the camp course.

In spite of this, there is no record in the War Department that he was ever inducted into the service. War Department records do show a John Robert Cochran, 2d, who registered with local board, division 1, Anderson, S. C., on September 9, 1918. He gave his age as 43 and stated he had a son in Savannah, Ga., 16 years of age. In view of the similarity in names it is believed that the man concerning whom you wrote is the son referred to. If this be true, his age would have prevented his induction, the minimum for which is 18.

I am sorry that I am unable to give you more definite information.

Sincerely yours,

C. B. ROBBINS,
Acting Secretary of War.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 15, 1928.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR BLEASE: By direction of the President, I am sending herewith a communication from the First Assistant Postmaster General regarding the postmastership at Anderson, S. C. Will you not be good enough to return it to the President after you are through with it?

Sincerely yours,

EVERETT SANDERS,
Secretary to the President.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington.

Hon. EVERETT SANDERS,
Secretary to the President,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SANDERS: Senator BLEASE, it would seem, must be laboring under some misapprehension of fact in this case. I get this impression from Senator MOSES, with whom I talked this morning.

The truth is that when the postmaster died on December 27, 1927, it seemed to be the proper thing to do in the emergency to appoint his son acting postmaster, and this was done on recommendation of National Committeeman Tolbert. A civil-service examination is being held, and it is the intention to let the son act until we get an eligible register from the Civil Service Commission. The son is ineligible for the examination under the civil-service rule, being under 30 years of age, which is the civil-service requirement in this class of office.

The rule as to nonresidence has never been held to apply to an acting postmaster. It is often necessary to get some one to act immediately, regardless of residence or age.

But this young man, about 27 years of age, was born and brought up in the town of Anderson, S. C., and I think he claims it as his residence. He is unmarried, as I understand it, and has for a few years been getting his living in other parts. He may be a resident of Georgia, but, as I said before, he came home upon the death of his father, and it was quite natural that he should pick up the post-office situation that his father was in and go along with it temporarily.

I think Senator BLEASE will see this situation and accept it.

Since his appointment as acting postmaster we have gotten telegrams from the mayor of the city, from the editor of a newspaper, and a lengthy petition from patrons approving of the selection and asking that he be made the permanent postmaster, and the petition states that they consider him a resident of Anderson.

The civil-service list should be out in a very few weeks, and it doesn't seem reasonable on the facts to put the son of the deceased postmaster out as acting postmaster and put another in.

I trust this is a satisfactory explanation, but if it is thought that we should change him as acting postmaster, in view of the situation, we can readily do so.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN H. BARTLETT,
First Assistant Postmaster General.

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., March 13, 1928.

Hon. COLEMAN L. BLEASE,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR BLEASE: The commission has noted S. 3328, introduced by you on February 21 and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, providing that every postmaster and acting postmaster shall reside within the delivery of the office to which he is appointed or within the town or city wherein the same is situated, and shall have so resided for a period of not less than one year and shall be a qualified voter of the State in which he is appointed. For your information the commission invites your attention to the present instructions issued by the President in an Executive order relative to the residence requirements for postmasters of the first, second, and third classes.

This order requires two years' residence within the delivery of the office immediately preceding the examination date. A postmaster may reside outside the State where his office is located if he is within the delivery thereof, as at present the delivery district of a post office is not affected by State boundaries.

The law now in effect governing postmasters does not require any length of residence prior to appointment and the regulations concerning fourth-class postmaster examinations carry out the intent of the law to the extent that applicants are required to be residents of the vacancy office at the time of examination as well as at the time of appointment. No specific length of residence is required in the case of fourth-class offices.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for February 20 makes reference to the case of J. R. Cochran, of Anderson, S. C. Mr. Cochran's application was rejected by the commission as it did not appear that he could meet the residence requirements for the Anderson office.

By direction of the commission.

Very respectfully,

JOHN T. DOYLE, Secretary.

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., March 17, 1928.

Senator COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR BLEASE: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter dated March 14, in which the statement is made that "Cochran is now postmaster at Anderson, regardless of any rules or any law on the statute books." This statement has reference to one J. R. Cochran, of Anderson, S. C., to whom reference was made in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for February 20, and whose application for appointment as postmaster at Anderson, S. C., was rejected by this commission because it did not appear that he could meet the residence requirements for the Anderson office.

Mr. Cochran is acting postmaster, having been appointed as such by the Postmaster General pending the appointment of a qualified eligible under the Executive order of May 10, 1921, which prescribes the manner of appointing presidential postmasters. His appointment as acting postmaster was made effective January 9, 1928, and at approximately the same time the Post Office Department requested a certification of eligibles from which to make selection for postmaster at Anderson. As soon as the register can be compiled from the examination which was held February 7, 1928, certification will be made.

It is desired to point out that under the Postal Regulations the appointment of an acting postmaster pending the selection of a regular postmaster under the Executive order of May 10, 1921, is left to the discretion of the Postmaster General.

By direction of the commission.

Very respectfully,

JOHN T. DOYLE, Secretary.

Senator COLE L. BLEASE,
Washington, D. C.:

Do not find name of John R. Cochran, acting postmaster, on registration books for the city of Anderson.

JOHN C. TAYLOR, Clerk of Court.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 5, 1928.

CITY CLERK AND TREASURER,
Anderson, S. C.:

Is John R. Cochran, now acting postmaster, a taxpayer in the city of Anderson? Has he been for several years past?

COLE L. BLEASE.

ANDERSON, S. C., January 5, 1928.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senate Chamber:

Your wire, Mr. Cochran's name does not appear on city tax books.

J. B. FARMER, Clerk and Treasurer.

[From the Anderson Independent of January 3, 1928]

JOHN COCHRAN, JR., IS CONSIDERED FOR LOCAL POSTMASTERSHIP, RUMOR—SON OF LATE POSTMASTER MAY BE HIS FATHER'S SUCCESSOR ACCORDING TO RUMORS LEAKING OUT OF GREENWOOD—WOULD MEET WITH LOCAL APPROVAL

A rumor coming out of Greenwood has it that John R. Cochran, jr., son of the late Postmaster John R. Cochran, who died suddenly on Monday, December 26, is looked upon favorably by Joe Tolbert, Republican national committeeman from this State, and that young Mr. Cochran is being seriously considered as a successor to his father. The rumor states further that Mr. Cochran's name has been submitted to President Coolidge for approval, and that Congress will be asked to consider the appointment within the next few days.

It is believed that the appointment of Mr. Cochran would meet with hearty approval here. The late John Cochran, sr., served efficiently and well for more than 20 years, and local people are in favor of the office continuing in the Cochran family so long as the Republicans are in power.

A number of Anderson citizens are pulling political wires in an effort to worm into the vacant postmastership, it is understood. But practically all of them are Democrats and are therefore virtually ineligible. Young Mr. Cochran is about 25 years old, being some three years older than his father was when he was appointed. Mr. Cochran was born and reared in Anderson, but for the past several years has been in Florida and Alabama. He attended school at the University of Georgia, where he specialized in business administration. At the present time he is manager of a large bottling plant in Montgomery, Ala.

The only other known possibility for the postmastership besides Mr. Cochran is John Robert Tolbert. Mr. Tolbert, who is a native of Greenwood, has been making his home in Anderson for the past six months. He is a United States deputy marshal, and is a member of the famous Tolbert clan. He is quoted as having said that he did not care for the appointment, and would not accept the position were it offered him.

[From the Columbia State of January 4, 1928]

JOHN R. COCHRAN SUCCEEDS FATHER—NAMED POSTMASTER AT ANDERSON—SENATOR BLEASE TO FIGHT CONFIRMATION

ANDERSON, January 3.—On the heels of the announcement to-day from Washington that John R. Cochran had been appointed postmaster at Anderson came word from United States Senator COLEMAN L. BLEASE, of South Carolina, that he would oppose confirmation. His grounds are that Mr. Cochran is not a resident of Anderson, and therefore is ineligible to succeed his father, John R. Cochran, former postmaster.

WASHINGTON, January 3.—John R. Cochran has been appointed acting postmaster at Anderson, S. C.

ANDERSON, January 3.—When he takes office as acting postmaster here, John R. Cochran probably will be the youngest postmaster in South Carolina.

He is 27 years old, and succeeds his father, who died several days ago of heart trouble.

John R. Cochran, sr., was 21 years old when he was appointed postmaster here in 1898 by President McKinley. He served as postmaster 22 years.

Appointment of the son of the late postmaster comes as no surprise here.

FORMERLY IN SAVANNAH

(Special to the State)

SAVANNAH, GA., January 3.—John R. Cochran, 27, appointed to-day acting postmaster at Anderson, S. C., vice his late father of the same name, was in the insurance business in Savannah for several years prior to leaving here last spring. He had lived before in Alabama and in Maryland. Telephoning to-night from Anderson to relatives in Savannah Mr. Cochran said he had always kept his legal residence in Anderson.

FARM RELIEF

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3555) to establish a Federal farm board to aid in the orderly marketing and in the control and disposition of the surplus of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Will the Chair state what amendment is now pending, if any?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COUZENS in the chair). The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], as modified, to insert, on page 26, after line 21:

(4) The words "agricultural commodity" mean an agricultural commodity which is nonperishable in its nature.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon state what he desires to do with the amendment?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I would like to perfect this amendment of mine, which is now pending, to have it read:

The words "agricultural commodity" mean an agricultural commodity which is not a fruit or vegetable

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think that exactly meets the situation; and, so far as I am personally able to do so, I accept the amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. Shall we take action upon it now?

Mr. McNARY. Yes; we might as well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York, as modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I will ask the clerk to report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, line 21, after the word "States," insert "shall be the producer of some one or more agricultural products or shall be interested in and truly representative of agriculture."

Mr. McKELLAR. That merely refers to the qualifications of the members of the board, and I take it that the Senator from Oregon agrees to that first amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Yes; as far as I can.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask the clerk to read the next amendment, on page 5.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 5, after line 15, the Senator from Tennessee proposes to insert:

No action having a general application to any one commodity shall be taken by the board unless first approved by a majority of the advisory council.

Mr. CARAWAY. What does that amendment mean? It says "having a general application."

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the language which was suggested.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, we can not hear what is going on in the Chamber.

Mr. CARAWAY. I think this is a very important matter, and the Senate ought to hear it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Arkansas has asked in reference to the language of the amendment on page 5, after line 15. I will read it, if the Senator will permit me:

No action having a general application to any one commodity shall be taken by the board unless first approved by a majority of the advisory council.

I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that, as he will recall, the bill provides that an advisory council of seven shall be appointed by the board.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am familiar with that.

Mr. McKELLAR. This is one of a number of amendments appearing in the RECORD of yesterday's proceedings. The purpose is to have the President appoint the advisory council by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and in all matters like the assessment of the equalization fee or like any question affecting generally a commodity, in a general way that does not apply to all the others——

Mr. CARAWAY. It is not the amendment we agreed upon, then?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is exactly the amendment that was agreed upon, with the suggestion of this language by representatives of the farm cooperative associations.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is it the intention of the Senator now to have the President appoint the advisory council?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is.

Mr. CARAWAY. And get them absolutely from under the control of the farm organizations?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; they are to be appointed from lists furnished by the board.

Mr. CARAWAY. I hope the Senator from Oregon, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, will not agree to the amendment, because it would import into the bill one of the very reasons the President gave for vetoing the bill when it was passed before.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, of course the chairman of the committee has no authority to accept any amendment.

Mr. CARAWAY. I understand that, but this is not the amendment we agreed upon. The amendment which was submitted and agreed to, when I had anything to do with it, was to the effect that the advisory council should be nominated by the farm groups and appointed by the board. This would incorporate into the bill one of the very reasons why the President vetoed the other bill, saying that we were invading his constitutional right to make the selections.

Mr. McNARY. I think the Senator from Arkansas forgets that confirmation is to be by the Senate. The appointments are to be made by the President upon the suggestion of the cooperative organizations—from lists they submit.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The President is not bound by them.

Mr. McNARY. Then the President makes the appointments, subject to confirmation by this body.

Mr. CARAWAY. He complained about that provision with reference to the board in the former bill, because he said we were invading his constitutional right, telling him whom he was permitted to appoint.

Mr. McNARY. But in that bill, as the Senator will recall, there was provided a nominating committee, and they were to submit three names. Under this they are to supply to him a representative list, from which he can make his own selections.

Mr. CARAWAY. What is the difference between submitting 3 and 300, if there exists the right to submit a list, and he can not go outside of it? Why change the language we agreed upon, which would provide that this advisory council shall be appointed by the board, making it absolutely responsive to the farm group? Let the farm group name the list from whom the board should select, so that they could not go outside the list of those the farmers themselves want. If Senators take the view of it now, that it has not any force and effect, that it is merely the expression of a wish, they may so tie their hands that the farmers can not get a single person they want on the board.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit a reading of the amendment found on page 2 of the redrafted section 4, I think it will meet his approval.

Mr. CARAWAY. This does not meet my approval.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will permit me, and will listen to it, I will read that amendment, which is a part of the one we have just been discussing. It is to insert, in lieu of section 4 of the bill:

SEC. 4. (a) Whenever the board determines that any agricultural commodity may thereafter require stabilization by the board through marketing agreements authorized by this act, or whenever the cooperative associations, or other organizations representative of the producers of the commodity, shall apply to the board for the creation and appointment of the advisory council for such commodity, then the board shall notify the President of such determination or application. The President shall thereupon create an advisory council for the commodity. The advisory council shall be composed of seven members to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. No individual shall be eligible for appointment to a commodity advisory council unless he resides in the region in which the commodity is principally grown, and is a producer of the commodity. Prior to the making of any appointment to a commodity advisory council, the board shall transmit to the President for his consideration lists of individuals qualified for appointment, to be submitted to the board by cooperative associations or other organizations representative of the producers of the commodity. The term of office of a member of any commodity advisory council shall be two years. In the event of a vacancy occurring, the President shall fill such vacancy in the same manner as the originally appointed member, and, should Congress not be in session, such appointee shall hold office until 20 days after the convening of the next session of Congress.

Mr. CARAWAY. What is the reason for taking away from the board the right to appoint this advisory council, so that we may know that the farmers will get exactly what they want? Why does the Senator want to make it speculative, so that the farmer may or may not get his friends on the board?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will state the reason for that. Under the terms of the bill as now drawn, the farm board would have a right to appoint the advisory council, but the advisory council could give any advice that it might see fit to give, and the board, which creates the advisory council, of course would not have to follow the advice of the council unless it desired to do so.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; but we agreed upon an amendment to cure that situation.

Mr. McKELLAR. This is the amendment, as I understand it.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; this is not the amendment, and if I may be permitted to say so without being offensive, whoever may slip that into the bill has handed the farmer a gold brick. It absolutely defeats the very object and purpose of the amendments agreed upon to make the bill responsive to the farmer. If you can not trust the farmer, just say so. That is all the amendment says.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I assumed that this was the amendment agreed upon.

Mr. CARAWAY. Absolutely, it is just the contrary.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thought, as the Senator from Oregon did, that the Senator from Arkansas had agreed to it. I am just mistaken about it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Absolutely, it is the converse of what we agreed upon.

Mr. McNARY. Let me suggest that for the present the Senator refrain from offering his amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will, for the present, and I will submit it to the Senator from Arkansas, because I assumed that it had his approval.

Mr. CARAWAY. The amendment we agreed upon put the power in the hands of the farmer, because the bill had to be drawn to meet the President's objections.

Mr. McKELLAR. I withdraw the amendment for the present.

Mr. CARAWAY. The bill had to be drawn to meet the President's objection as to limiting his constitutional right to make appointments. We could say that the advisory council, which was nominated by the farmers and must be appointed by the board, should have full power to say when a marketing operation should commence and when it should end. Therefore the board would be merely ministerial when it came to the most important part of the bill. But this amendment absolutely takes away from the farmer any chance to have his wishes respected at all. It changes the whole purpose and intent of the amendment and destroys whatever little control the farmer would have over his marketing machinery. It seems to me unthinkable that it should be urged upon the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I can not agree with the conclusions of the Senator from Arkansas with respect to the amendment. I think the amendment does exactly the reverse of what the Senator from Arkansas contends it does.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator let me ask him a question? We can settle that in just a minute.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will allow me to proceed a little further, then I think he will understand me better.

The bill as originally drawn provided for the selection of a board of 12 by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Practically all power was vested in that board. It also provided that if the growers of a commodity saw fit to come in and take advantage of the provisions of the bill for a period, that a council of seven should be appointed to represent that particular product. But the bill provided that that council should be appointed by the board. There was no limitation whatever upon the power of the board with reference to the appointment of the council. The council, when appointed, had very little power. Its powers were almost wholly confined, if not absolutely confined, to recommendations and advice.

The friends of the amendments now offered insisted that that lodged practically all power in the board, because the council would have little power to begin with, and the council would be so absolutely dependent for its life and existence upon the board that its members would, of course, do the bidding of the board. Therefore, in order that a product like cotton or tobacco or wheat, when it entered to take advantage of the provisions of the bill, should have somebody there who would be especially interested in that product and represent it, and with some power of independence in the position which its representatives took, it was decided by the committee that we would urge that the council as well as the board be appointed by the President. I do not think the Senator from Arkansas was present, however, when that determination was reached; I am quite sure he was not.

Now, it is argued that we would restrict the rights of the President, in the making of the appointments, to the point where there would be an infringement upon his constitutional prerogative. Such is not the case.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the Senator is aware of one of the reasons given by the President for his veto of the other bill, that we tried to limit his right to make appointments. Under the amendment to which we agreed in the committee room, when I never thought there was to be any change in it, we said that, while we could not restrict his right to appoint the board from whatever source he saw fit, we could make the board employ or appoint an advisory council that the farmers themselves might select, because the board would have no discretion, and, therefore, we could make the advisory council absolutely the agent of the producer, over which the board would have absolutely no control. Now, the amendment takes that away from the farmer and provides that the President may appoint the advisory council also, and he can go wherever he pleases to do it, because under the Constitution we can not compel him to do otherwise.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to say very emphatically that I had infinitely rather have the President appoint the council, with the advice and consent of the Senate, than to have the board appoint the council at their will.

Mr. CARAWAY. But that was not the original amendment. The amendment was that the board should appoint, as an advisory council, those people whom the farmers' organizations recommended, and nobody else. We could require the board to name the council so we would not have to submit more than seven names, and they would have to accept them. Then the council would be the agents of the producers and not of the board, and would be responsive to the agricultural interests of the country, because the agricultural interests recommended them and forced their appointment. Under the proposed amendment the President could appoint an advisory council for tobacco from among whomsoever he saw fit, and they might not know tobacco from acorns.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is entirely mistaken about that.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is what it says. I may not know lots of things, but I do know how to read, and I do know that as long as——

Mr. SIMMONS. There are others of us who know how to read also.

Mr. CARAWAY. I know that. I know that as long as the advisory board was to be made up of men selected by the agricultural group and appointed by the board, neither the President nor anyone else could interfere. We would get just exactly whoever the farmers wanted. If they have sense enough to know their friends, they would get them. But under the provisions of the amendment as now submitted they absolutely lose control of the council, because the President has the constitutional right and we can not restrict him in the making of appointments when we create the office.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, Mr. President, we have repeatedly restricted, not the number of persons from whom the President might select, as did the provision in the bill of 1926——

Mr. CARAWAY. He vetoed that measure on that account.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; he vetoed it on that ground and I am not now complaining of his veto with respect to that matter.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then we provided for the selection of certain men by the farmers' organizations and provided that the President should select the appointees from that list.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the President said that he would veto it because we confined his list to 26, he would have the right to veto it if we named a million on the list. It is not a question of how many, but whether we have the right to do it at all. It does not make any difference whether the President is right or wrong, as long as he can sign his name to the veto of a material measure he can do it, and the Senator knows he will do it on that ground.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, if the Senator is through, I will proceed with what I started to say.

Mr. CARAWAY. I shall not interrupt the Senator again.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not mean the Senator may not interrupt me if he desires at any time, and I assure him of my desire to be entirely courteous to him.

Mr. President, what the amendment does, as I understand it, is simply to say that the council appointed to represent a particular commodity may recommend to the President certain persons as eligible, as qualified, for the position, but it does not require the President to appoint from that list. The President may absolutely ignore that list, although it may contain 100 names. But it is provided that the President shall appoint a person who is a producer of the product or substantially interested in the production of the product. The latitude of the President is not limited beyond the right of the Congress to limit it.

We have enacted legislation of that character here repeatedly. We provided in one act, I remember, that in the selection of representatives upon the Shipping Board, appointees should be taken from certain sections of the United States. We provided that the representatives of certain interests should be selected, and only the representatives of certain interests. When we get to the bottom of his matter that is all the amendment now proposes. It provides that the President may appoint, if he chooses to do so, from the list submitted to him by the council representing the particular article or product; but if he does not desire to do that he may refuse to make a selection from that list and may make another selection; but when he does make the selection, it must be somebody who is a producer of the product for which the council is to be appointed.

I submit that that limitation is not one which infringes or in any way tends to impair the power of the President under the Constitution. It is a method to which we have frequently resorted in order to secure protection of just the character we are seeking in this bill. It would not be obnoxious to the objection made by the Senator from Arkansas, and neither would the President find any ground in it upon which to base a veto.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COPELAND in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. What advantage can come to agriculture by having the advisory council appointed by the President when we can let it be named by the board and we can absolutely name the individual? We can tell the board under the bill that this one man, which a particular organization names, shall be appointed, and nobody else, and it is mandatory upon the board, and it has no discretion; it has to appoint him. But under the amendment now submitted the only thing left to the agricultural interests is to put up a list of names, and the President may select from among them or he may not. What advantage do we get by taking away from the farmer the absolute control of his own business and injecting it into the uncertain field of presidential politics, subject to the whim and wish of the administration, whoever it may be? What reason can be offered for denying the farmer the right to take his agent from whatever class he wants to name, naming John Jones or Henry Smith, and nobody can say them nay? But under the amendment as now presented the President, if we name Smith, may hand us Brown. I see no advantage that would come from such a provision.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, it is the broad difference between a council appointed by the board and a council appointed by the President with the consent of the Senate. If the council is appointed by the board the Senate has nothing to do with it. The board may appoint whomsoever it pleases.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, no; it must appoint the very man that the agricultural interests ask for; it has no discretion; it is purely an administrative act. So the farmer may name absolutely the agent he wants. Under the amendment as it is the farmer may suggest and then have to take whoever is given him. Why should the farmer want to be denied the right to be absolutely certain that he will get the individual agent that he wants?

The Senator says that the President will have to select from a group, but he may take anybody in that group that he wants to.

Mr. SIMMONS. The President may take any producer of the product whom he wants to; there is no limitation of his power; but the Senate is not required to take anybody whose name the President may send it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator fear to trust the farmers and therefore want a veto on their choice? Is he not willing that the farmers who create the wealth shall say how it shall be disposed of, or does he think they ought not to sell a hogshead of tobacco or a bale of cotton unless the Senate shall ratify the transaction?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not desire——

Mr. CARAWAY. That is exactly what will be the result of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course, I deny that assertion. If the Senator will let me have just one word in my own time, let me say that this bill as originally drafted put the agricultural interests of the country entirely in the hands of a board selected by the President and the cooperative associations of farmers; and I do not want to have those interests put absolutely in the hands of either. I want to see the right of selection——

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator will pardon me, his first statement is incorrect. It did not put the interests of agriculture in either the hands of the cooperatives or of the board; it put them in the hands of the organized farmers.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, Mr. President, after this bill shall be passed, if it shall be passed in its original form, the organized farmers of the country generally will mean cooperative associations, and nothing else. I desire that the Senate of the United States shall have as much power over the appointment of the advisory councils as it has over the appointment of the board. I think that it is as important to the cotton interests of the South that the Senate as the representative of the States shall have the power to determine at least who shall not represent upon the advisory council the interests of the different agricultural products. I think that section by section we are as much interested in the advisory councils as we are in the general board, and therefore I have been anxious to make the councils independent of the board.

Mr. CARAWAY. And of the farmer.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; not independent of the farmer.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is just what the Senator's amendment will do.

Mr. SIMMONS (continuing). Because we have provided in the amendment that nobody shall be appointed upon the council who is not a producer of the commodity, and if the President violates that instruction the Senate will have the right to reject and to repudiate the action of the President. The producers are, if anything, more interested in the council and its fitness and qualifications and its interests and sympathy even than they are in the board.

The council represents the particular agricultural industry; the council has to do with vital questions affecting the particular industry; and I think the council ought to be as independent of the board in its action as the board is of the President in its action.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from North Carolina a question?

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall be very glad to hear the Senator's question and will answer it.

Mr. CARAWAY. I merely want to make a brief statement. Without bandying this question further backward and forward, the Senator from North Carolina says he wants to make the board responsive, as I gather from his remarks, to the Senate. Under the amendment that we agreed to, as I understood, the board became absolutely the creature, the agent of agriculture. It was to name every member of the advisory council, and nobody could veto the farmer. Now, if the Senator is correct, if he is not willing for the cotton producers to select their agents unless the Senate shall have the right to review the selections, I can not understand the amendment. Personally, I am willing to let the farmers select their agents. If they are not better farmers than I and some of the others of us have proved to be, I presume they ought to have guardians appointed, as most of us who are farmers may have to have receivers appointed for us pretty soon. Under the amendment agreed upon, the farmer was absolutely his own master; he could select his own agents and nobody, high or low, could control his selection. Necessarily, then, his agent would be his creature. Under the amendment he would have only the right to put his hat under his arm and say, "Now, Mr. President, if in your wisdom you are willing that I shall have one of the million agents that I might designate, I will be duly thankful." I am told that the Senate can reject a nomination made by the President. Of course it can. It can reject any nomination he may submit; but it can not make him send in the name of somebody else that suits us any better. We can reduce the bill to an absolutely useless number of words by authorizing the Executive to determine who shall be the agents, when we have it in our power to make the agent absolutely responsive to the farmers and to nobody else. Why does the Senator want to surrender that power?

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I should like to proceed.

Mr. CARAWAY. I was not quite through, but of course I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; go ahead. I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator from North Carolina has something he wishes to say I would rather yield the floor than not have him say it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was simply going to say that recently the Committee on Commerce reported a measure and it was passed by the Senate which, in pursuance of a custom and precedent that has been followed here ever since I have been in the Senate, provided for a certain board, a very vital board, in connection with flood control, that board to have the jurisdiction and the power to determine any differences existing between what is known as the Jadwin program of flood control and the Mississippi River Commission flood-control plan.

All questions of difference are to be settled by that particular board, as the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], now sitting at my right, will recall. It is provided in the act that the Secretary of War shall be ex officio a member; that the Chief of Army Engineers shall be a member; that the president of the Mississippi River Commission shall be a member; and the President shall then appoint two civilian engineers to make up that board of five. What we have done in the case of the pending bill is similar to that.

Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senate that when I first read this bill there were two things that especially impressed me; first, that the arrangement with reference to the appointment of a council put the whole administration of this complex system in the hands practically of the board itself. There is a provision that the board shall, in making appointments to the advisory council, receive the recommendations of the cooperative associations and farm organizations, and there is also a provision that it shall appoint persons representing the particular commodity, but there is no power to make the board conform to those requirements. If the board should see fit to disregard those requirements in the act and appoint a man from New York to represent the cotton industry of the country, there would be no remedy against their action. That was one situation that confronted me. Again, I felt the council was so important to agriculture, especially the larger agricultural industries, so important to the wheat producers, for instance, having the entire control of the administration of the legislation as it affected wheat, and so important to the great cotton industry, and so important to tobacco, that the council ought to be independent of the board and ought not to be a mere servant and tool and puppet of the board, and that ordinary caution would dictate that the Senate should have the right to confirm or reject the appointees to the council. Of course, if the appointments were made by the board, the Senate would have no power to reject them.

The only way the Senate could acquire this right of confirmation or rejection was to require the appointments to be made by the President. In this way the Senate retains its control over the confirmation of the nominations, so that if the President should abuse his authority and appoint some one contrary to the provisions and spirit of the law and not truly representative of the interests involved the Senate will have a check upon him. If the board as constituted in this bill as originally presented shall appoint somebody other than a farmer, there is nobody to check it up; there is nobody to restrain its usurpation in that regard.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has given a great deal of attention to this bill and particularly this feature of it. Is it a practical proposition to have the producers of the commodity elect the advisory board?

Mr. SIMMONS. The bill provides that a council of seven shall be appointed for each commodity.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; but the only thing the farmer has to do with it is twice removed; that is the appointments are made from a list recommended by the cooperative associations.

Mr. SIMMONS. Practically so.

Mr. BORAH. That is what the bill provides.

Mr. SIMMONS. The bill reads:

> The board is hereby authorized and directed to create an advisory council of seven members fairly representative of the producers of such commodity. Members of each commodity advisory council shall be selected annually by the board from lists submitted by cooperative associations or other organizations representative of the producers of the commodity.

Mr. BORAH. The only relationship which the actual producer has with it is whatever relationship he may have through the association. Is it not practicable to enable the producers of a commodity to select their advisory board and give that advisory board the authority to say whether or not that commodity can be taken under these marketing agreements?

Mr. SIMMONS. I would not object, Mr. President, to the representatives of the commodity concerned appointing the council, but I do object to letting the board select the council.

Mr. BORAH. I quite agree with the Senator upon that proposition.

Mr. SIMMONS. Notwithstanding the provision here restricting the authority of the board in the case of appointments to the council, I say if they disregard those limitations—and there are instances where such limitations have been disregarded in the past—that we have no power to remedy that wrong.

Mr. BORAH. In my humble judgment, the real producer will be a bystander in this whole proposition. He really has not any checking power anywhere.

Mr. SIMMONS. Not as much as I should like him to have. If the Senator can prepare a workable amendment that would give the representatives of the commodity the right to appoint the council, that would suit me better than anything else; but it is very difficult to get a fair representative action out of a vast number of citizens, scattered all over this country, who may represent a particular product, unless you are going to put it absolutely in the hands of the cooperatives.

Mr. BORAH. I know it is difficult. That is where the difficulty arises, in getting them together; but the fact remains that there ought to be some method by which the real producers could have some check upon two propositions in this bill. They ought to have a check, in the first place, upon the question of whether or not the commodity is going to be taken in charge by the general board, and secondly, a check upon the amount of the fee.

Mr. SIMMONS. We have the first.

Mr. SMITH. That is provided in a subsequent amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; that is provided, absolutely.

Mr. SMITH. It is then, provided, that no action shall be taken in reference to any commodity except a majority of the appointed advisory council agrees.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will examine all these amendments together—I do not know whether he has had an opportunity to read them or not—he will see that these amendments tend to put vast power in the hands of this council when it is once created.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, we are dealing with the manner of creating it.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. The virtue of the whole proposition depends upon the manner of creating this advisory council.

Mr. SIMMONS. Exactly. Therefore, I think it is as important as the board, and ought to be independent of it.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not going to consent to the plan now carried in the bill, because I see no reason for a council if it is to be a mere puppet of the board and enjoy no privilege or power except that of recommendation and advice, which can be disregarded at the will of the board.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I should like to state to the Senator from Idaho that every subsequent amendment to this bill has recognized that the fate of each commodity under this proposed marketing system is going to rest, under the amendments we propose, with the advisory council.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. Unless that is done I, for one, can not support the bill.

Mr. BORAH. I agree perfectly with the Senator upon the proposition that the advisory council, representing a particular commodity, should have a check upon the actions of the board. I think they ought to be authorized to say that the board shall not proceed with the marketing proposition with reference to any commodity without their consent. I agree with that. Then the manner of the creation of the advisory council becomes all the more vital.

Mr. SMITH. Has the Senator any suggestion to make other than the one that was so painstakingly worked out by those who were interested in one commodity, at least, when we sought to restrict, as far as we could safely do so, the appointment of these men so as to represent the actual producers of the commodity? The language may be unfortunate; but the intent was that the actual producers, representatives of those who would be vocationally and commercially interested in the production of the commodity, should be on the council.

Mr. BORAH. These amendments only came to our desks this morning, and it is difficult and perhaps not just to criticize them without further consideration; but I ask the Senator, how is this advisory board made up? I see that the President is to appoint the members.

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator will read the text of the amendment, it is provided that they shall be selected in accordance with the original text of the bill—that is, the names of prospective members are to be submitted by cooperatives and farm organizations—but it is not limited to that; and that is what we are trying to get away from, so that if, outside of those representing the farmers, there should be a more available man, a better man, he could be named.

Mr. BORAH. It may be that that is as close as you can get it back to the producer, but it is unfortunate if it is.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me read the Senator the language of this amendment concerning the appointment of the board:

> The advisory council shall be composed of seven members, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. No individual shall be eligible for appointment to a commodity advisory council unless he resides in the region in which the commodity is principally grown and is a producer of the commodity. Prior to the making of any appointment to a commodity advisory council the board shall transmit to the President for his consideration lists of individuals qualified for appointment, to be submitted to the board by cooperative associations or other organizations representative of the producers of the commodity.

Mr. BORAH. The effect of your amendment is to take the appointing power out of the board, and place it in the President?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. On the theory that the Senate can reject the appointments in case they are not satisfactory?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; in case they are not satisfactory, and in case they are not made in conformity to the provisions of the act.

Mr. SMITH. And one other view: If the board is given this appointive power, it goes without saying that these advisory councils would be hardly persuasive, because they would be the creatures of the board, and it is natural to suppose that they would more nearly represent what the board wanted than what was absolutely vital and necessary in reference to the particular commodity which they represented; and for that reason we suggested the present form.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the Federal reserve act provides that each Federal reserve bank shall have a board of directors. It goes on to tell how they shall be selected, and what business they shall be engaged in:

> Class A shall consist of three members, who shall be chosen by and be representative of the stock-holding banks.
> Class B shall consist of three members, who at the time of their election shall be actively engaged in their district in commerce, agriculture, or some other industrial pursuit.

And it prescribes who shall not be on it:

> No Senator or Representative in Congress shall be a member of the Federal Reserve Board or an officer or a director of a Federal reserve bank.
>
> No director of class B shall be an officer, director, or employee of any bank.
> No director of class C shall be an officer, director, employee, or stockholder of any bank.

So we have a precedent for the very thing that the amendment here undertakes to do. We have a right to say that this board shall be composed of farmers.

Mr. BORAH. I am not objecting to that feature of it.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from Arkansas seemed to be objecting to that feature of it.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I am of the opinion that any plan for agricultural relief must take care of crop surpluses. That is one of the big problems confronting the agricultural industry of America to-day.

S. 3555, now before us, undertakes, among other things, to stabilize the prices of farm products by removing the surplus from the domestic market. If there is a loss incurred in the operation, each producer of the losing product is assessed his share of the "fee" to make up the loss. That is about all there is to the much-discussed equalization fee. It is not a charge against the Government.

In the new McNary-Haugen bill now before us, the proposed Federal farm board is directed to apply first the loan features of the bill to stabilize prices. If, with this assistance, cooperative and other farm organizations should be unable to bring about stabilization, the board may resort to the equalization fee.

I am of the opinion that surplus-control legislation without the equalization fee principle would be ineffective. The equalization fee is the most practical plan suggested for meeting the costs of the much-needed control of crop surpluses. In the light of the mass of testimony submitted to the Senate Committee on Agriculture by economists and other competent authorities, I say that we are abundantly justified in giving this plan a trial.

In any branch of legislation a perfect measure is not to be expected the first time. It is history that all constructive laws have to be strengthened and improved as experience indicates is necessary. This will, of course, be the history of farm relief legislation, and we might well be getting that experience now.

To deny the farmers the McNary-Haugen bill with the equalization fee is to deny them the benefits of the protective-tariff system. Leaders of farm organizations from all over the West have assured the Congress that their members are willing to pay this tax. They have particularly emphasized the fact that they do not want anything in the nature of a subsidy from the Government. I am sure that is the feeling of farmers generally.

The nub of the matter is that farming as an industry can not go on without a fair price for its products and a reasonable return on its investment. That means there must be some sort of a stabilized market.

What shall be the means employed to stabilize the market has been the chief question all along. So far nothing as likely to be effective as the equalization fee plan has been evolved in the six years farm relief has been debated.

Mr. President, I particularly commend that part of this bill which creates a Federal farm board to aid in the orderly marketing of agricultural commodities. It will pay this Government and its people to definitely organize agriculture as industry is organized and as labor is organized. The farmer himself will probably do this in time, but it will pay the Government to help and particularly to help the farmer organize his bargaining power. As I sense the thought of farm folks, they are eagerly looking for specific and concrete suggestions that will help them or enable them to help themselves in solving their immediate difficulties. They are more than willing to do their part in getting out of the slough onto solid ground. They are not asking for a subsidized profit or a pensioned existence from the Government. What they are looking for, I believe, is leadership from the Government—a leadership that will point out a good road to travel and help them get started on it. And that is why I feel that the Federal Government might well assume the leadership in cooperative marketing to the extent that it would become the instrument of organization as well as the sponsor. The fostering of large-scale cooperative effort, as proposed in S. 3555, would be a good investment for the Government. Farmers would have the confidence in a Government-formed cooperative enterprise that they lack in a private or group formed cooperative enterprise. Once established, the Government would be in a position to withdraw itself and turn the proposition over to the farmer members.

Mr. President, the high cost of distribution hits the farmer coming and going. It depresses the price he gets for his products and he has to pay it when he buys manufactured products. The cost of distribution is undoubtedly one of the major agricultural problems and ought to be included in any national program for the relief of agriculture.

The governmental machinery set up in this bill will be of great assistance to the farmers' cooperative movement. Cooperative marketing of farm products appeals to me as being one of the best ways in which the problem of the high cost of distribution of foodstuffs may be solved. The fact that the consumer pays often more than twice as much as the producer receives for his food stuffs, due to the costliness of distribution, seems unjust. Certainly if some of the unnecessary selling machinery between the consumer and the producer could be eliminated, the two could divide the saving to the advantage of both. If the farmers can organize into great cooperatives which could control food products and feed them into the market, they would be in position to maintain a fair domestic price, because they would have control of the surplus. And were they in position to process much of this food it certainly, by virtue of its control, could reduce the costs of distribution.

Mr. President, our cities are now feeling the pinch that was bound to come as a result of the depression in agriculture. There was decided lack of optimism in the report of the National Industrial Conference Board following its careful survey of agriculture. And the business men's commission on agriculture of the United States Chamber of Commerce recommended rather general tariff reforms in the interest of the farmer—a remarkable demonstration of unselfishness on the part of well-protected business.

When such a business group admits that agriculture's difficulties "are traceable to the undue advantages that other groups have secured for themselves" through tariff laws, and so forth, can there be any further doubt of it?

In its appeal recently broadcast to editors of newspapers and magazines to support the pending farm legislation in Congress as all-important to business, industry, and finance, the Illinois Bankers' Association said:

> The lack of real purchasing power of the farmer's dollar is not alone due to natural influences, but has been caused to a large extent by an artificial stimulation of other products brought about by prior Federal legislation. Therefore some balance in legislation is required.

Mr. President, that puts the case in few words. There is a farm problem, and that problem is to bring the agricultural industry up to the level of other industries, as the measure before us seeks to do. Until this is done we shall have a serious economic condition on our hands.

Note from these figures of the United States Department of Agriculture on the purchasing power of the farmer's dollar, what a rocky road to travel he has had all these years. One hundred cents represents the normal farm dollar:

	Cents
1914	103
1915	99
1916	72
1917	55
1918	53
1919	50
1920	41
1921	60
1922	60
1923	58
1924	62
1925	60
1926	62

These figures are sufficiently shocking as showing the low state of the industry. But the crop year ending June 30, 1927, recorded a decrease of 20 per cent in the farmer's net income compared with the preceding year. Besides that, the return for the labor of the farmer and his family declined nearly 10 per cent, while earnings of factory employees were as high in 1926–27 as in 1925–26.

Mr. President, it is nothing new for industries to be in need of legislation. Every industry from manufacturing to railroads, from labor to bankers, has been so helped and is being helped all the time to their benefit and the Nation's welfare in most cases. The chief trouble of the farmer has been the disparity in the prices paid for farm products and the prices which the farmer pays for his necessities. This disparity, in my opinion, is caused in part by certain privileges and favors obtained from the Government by other groups which place the farmer at a disadvantage.

After a prolonged and gradually losing struggle the agricultural industry finds that if it is to go forward henceforth it must participate in the American protective system on an equality with other industries. Things can never be right in this country when the farmers' purchasing power is below par. Farmers have got to have a fair return for what they grow. Give them that and they can iron out their other difficulties without trouble.

Those who say the condition of the agricultural industry is improving permanently do not know the facts, or they disregard them. There is, of course, some temporary improvement occasionally, but the real farm problem is here to stay until we solve it.

Mr. President, I am convinced the passage of the McNary-Haugen bill will do more to relieve agricultural distress than any other measure now before Congress, but it is a mistake to assume that this measure or any other single measure can at once restore permanent prosperity to agriculture. I believe that a comprehensive national policy or program that will deal with all the factors causing agricultural distress is a necessity at this time.

The McNary-Haugen plan proposes an answer to the control of surplus production of export crops in such a way that the surplus sold abroad at the world price will not destroy the domestic price. I believe it is the best plan ever devised so far as that problem is concerned, but we must not lose sight of the fact that there are other problems that are almost as troublesome to the farmer as the problem of the surplus.

There is the problem of transportation costs, for example. Industry in the Middle West has been marooned by the present rate structure. Without necessary rail-rate readjustments the western farmer and the business man, too, see little relief for the future except the possible development of waterways. Prompt development of our internal waterway system is of the utmost concern to the agricultural prosperity of the central States.

Then we have the question of taxation which places such a huge burden on the western farmer to-day. The tax burden is proportionally greater on the farmer than on the rest of society. When it takes from one-fourth to one-third or even more of the revenue of the land to pay the taxes, where does the landowner get off? In many States farmers, individually and through their organizations, are striving to readjust and shift this tax burden, but we have no national policy on this question.

Our Government explores the world for the purpose of expanding foreign markets for our industrial products. But are we doing all that we can to extend the world markets for those products of the farm that make up approximately one-half of our total exports? Here is an idea that should be included in a national policy for the benefit of agriculture.

We have the question of adjusting the tariff to the benefit of agriculture. The tariff is undoubtedly quite a factor contributing to the present disparity between the prices received and the prices paid by the farmer, but even the farmer does not want to see the business of the Nation destroyed by a sudden tariff revolt.

I say, Mr. President, it is time for Congress to get down to the real solution of the farmer's problem by drafting the best brains of the Nation and putting them to the task of building a broad and lasting program for agriculture as a matter of public policy. The more specific a national agricultural program can be made the more likely it is to have a salutary effect not only on farmers but on everyone else.

Vital to the prosperity of the Nation, Mr. President, is the working out of this national agricultural program, a program which will give the farmer a square deal in production, in transportation, and in marketing, a program which should embody a national policy that would persist for generations, so that agriculture shall prosper and bring prosperity to all.

In my judgment, Mr. President, this bill will be a big step in the direction of solving this national problem, and should be passed at once.

I ask unanimous consent to include as a part of my remarks a statement from Mr. Ralph Snyder, president of the Kansas State Farm Bureau, in support of the pending bill.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KANSAS STATE FARM BUREAU,
Manhattan, Kans., March 20, 1928.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: I have, during the past six months, made quite a careful canvas of the sentiment in Kansas for and against the McNary-Haugen bill. I find without any question a very strong sentiment for this measure. This is especially true since the new bill has been introduced. While, of course, a great many know comparatively little about it, yet they nearly all feel that it should be given a thorough trial. They do not feel that any other measure that has been proposed is much more than a mere gesture, and the Kansas farmers are tired of gestures. The one possible exception is the export debenture plan which has been indorsed by the Grange, but I find the objection to that that it is a direct subsidy, and as such, hurts the pride of the Kansas farmer, who, as we all know, is a very independent spirit.

Late advices from Washington seem to indicate there may be some trouble in getting the measure through Congress. I have talked to a great many influential farmers. They seem to be unanimously of the opinion that we would be better off with nothing at all than with something that would be ineffective.

You will perhaps be interested in knowing that a resolution indorsing the McNary-Haugen bill with the equalization-fee principle received more enthusiastic indorsement than any other resolution passed at our recent annual meeting at Dodge City; that the Kansas Agricultural Council, composed of representatives of all the farm organizations of the State, indorsed the principle, as did also the State board of agriculture at its recent meeting. Previous to all of these the State farmers' union in their annual meeting passed a strong resolution for the measure. No opposition developed in any of these meetings. You, of course, know that the State board of agriculture has been very conservative on this matter—in fact, quite a number of them were formerly opposed to any such measure. The fact that this went through with no opposition this time is very encouraging to me.

I am writing this, thinking perhaps you would be interested in knowing what the situation is here.

Sincerely yours,

RALPH SNYDER, President.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not going to enter into any extended discussion of this bill, but there is one proposition which I should like to call to the attention of the advocates of the bill. I feel that we ought seriously to consider the proposition of eliminating the equalization fee and making an appropriation direct for the purpose of testing this experiment. There is no advocate of the bill but will admit that this proposition is an experiment. Able men believe it could be made effective to aid agriculture, and great economists and other men who have studied the subject believe that it will break down. I have a view in regard to that, but I am perfectly willing, for the purpose of the presentation of this matter, to take the view that it will succeed.

The great, fundamental proposition underlying legislation with reference to the farmer is to place him upon an equality with the other enterprises and industries of the country. It is claimed, and justly claimed, that for the last few years the farmer has been operating under a legal and economic system which places him at a disadvantage in the industrial world by reason of his inequality, and there is no point at which that inequality is more distinct and marked than with reference to taxation. As that is the basis upon which I wish to found this part of my argument, I want to call attention to some facts with regard to that.

In 1913 taxes took about one-tenth of the farm receipts, less other expenses. In 1921 taxes took about one-third of the farm receipts, less other expenses. From 1913 until 1921, eight brief years, the taxes had increased the difference between one-tenth of the farm receipts less other expenses and one-third. So long as that creeping paralysis continues there is no conceivable form of legislation which will settle the farm question.

Mr. GLASS. Would the Senator call it creeping paralysis? It seems to me it has made a pretty rapid pace.

Mr. BORAH. I accept the amendment. In 1926 taxes were in excess of farm receipts. In 1913, 155 farms in Indiana, Ohio, and Wisconsin paid taxes to the extent of $112 per farm. In 1921 those farms paid taxes to the extent of $253 per farm.

In 1914 general property taxes paid by farmers were $344,000,000, roughly speaking, equal to two-fifths of the value of the wheat crop of that year. In 1922 the general property taxes paid by farmers were $797,000,000, approximately equal to the entire wheat crop of that year. In 1926 the general property taxes of farmers were $890,000,000. I repeat, Mr. President, that there is one of the problems which must be considered in connection with farm relief. Any plan which increases his tax burden, any scheme which adds to his outlay, is not only injustice to him but it continues that inequality against which he is now struggling.

It will be seen that the increase of taxes continues to take practically the farmer's crop. Farm taxes can not be shifted like taxes on manufactured goods. The farmer's property is all in sight. Everything he has is there. Although the war ended five years ago our Federal taxes are about five times what they were in 1914; $700,254,490 in 1914, and in 1925 there were $3,529,640,000.

Again, Mr. President, the ratio of taxes to income in 1913 was, farmers 10.6 per cent, as compared with 4.1 per cent for the remainder of the community. While we are considering the question of imposing a special tax, or a special fee, upon the farmer, in order to enable him to enjoy remedial legislation, do not forget that for years he has been paying a tax which amounts to 10 per cent of his income, compared with 4.1 per cent for the remainder of the community.

In 1922 the ratio of taxes to income of farmers was 16.6 per cent, as compared with 11.9 per cent for other people.

If that is the true situation—and I have gathered these figures from sources which I think will not be questioned and from different sources, but they are all practically the same, upon what possible theory can we hope to establish the equality of the farmer with the other industries of the country when we propose to impose upon him a tax to take care of whatever remedial legislation he is to enjoy? Upon what theory can we ask the farmer to pay especially for remedial legislation, a thing which has never been imposed upon any other industry in the United States? Let us assume this tax is constitutional. Is it just, is it equitable, is it doing what you profess to do, giving the farmer an equal opportunity in the struggle for success? How many farms now ready to be sold for taxes will you save from the hammer if you continue this inequality?

I look upon the farm problem as a national problem. No one can appreciate its present condition and not recognize that it is a national problem. We are legislating to-day not for a class but for the whole country. It is just as essential that the United States have prosperity upon the farm as it is that it have prosperity in the manufacturing establishment. And yet we impose a duty for the purpose of protecting manufactured articles, which costs the manufacturers not one cent, and in order to give the farmer the other end of protection we propose to impose upon him a tax which is to take care of his remedial legislation. Under that rule of legislation the farmer will always suffer the inequality which he suffers at the present time.

If we eliminate the equalization fee we eliminate practically every legal proposition about which there is any controversy in the bill. There is one legal proposition which has been suggested and that is the lack of power of the Congress to appropriate money for the purpose of experimenting upon the proposition. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to read many authorities. I think the able Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] stated the rule the other day, and stated it correctly. I believe there are ample decisions to sustain his position, and certainly there are ample precedents in legislation. It would be easy to gather a multitude of precedents so far as legislation is concerned, and in my opinion it would be easy to gather a sufficient number of authorities to show that these precedents are within the Constitution. Senators will recall the case which involved the payment of a bounty to the sugar raisers, in which it was undertaken to appropriate from the Treasury of the United States a sum to be paid directly to a certain class of agriculturalists to encourage them in the raising of a particular product. It was a direct appropriation from the Treasury to a limited number of agriculturalists, and that act was sustained. The Supreme Court said, reading from the syllabus:

> The appropriations of money by the act of March 2, 1895, to be paid to certain manufacturers and producers of sugar who had complied with the provisions of the act of October 1, 1895, were within the power of Congress to make, and were constitutional and valid.
> It is within the constitutional power of Congress to determine whether claims upon the public Treasury are founded upon moral and honorable obligations, and upon principles of right and justice; and having decided such questions in the affirmative, and having appropriated public money for the payment of such claims, its decision can rarely, if ever, be the subject of review by the judicial branch of the Government.

The decision seems to me fully to support the syllabus.

Mr. Cooley in his Constitutional Principles states that where the Congress appropriates money with a view to serving the public interest, it is beyond the power of the courts to review the question. I do not know whether the courts will ever go so far as to say that the judgment of Congress is conclusive, but the rules which it has established in their practical results amount to that proposition.

But here, Mr. President, is distinctly a great public interest. The whole country is involved in the success of agriculture. The breakdown or the driving of the farmer into peonage would be no less a national disaster than the breakdown of the manufacturers of the country. It would be no less a disaster in the long run than the breakdown of our transportation system. It is distinctly a matter which touches the weal or woe of every man, woman, and child in the United States. Does anyone contend that Congress may not make an appropriation to furnish the means which will rehabilitate and restore a great enterprise or a great industry which touches the welfare of the entire country? And, the authority being granted, is it anything less than an injustice to ask the farmer to experiment with his own pocketbook in determining whether or not the plan will effectually bring him desired results?

Mr. President, if we should appropriate at this time $500,000,000, it would not equal the amount of taxes which the American farmer has paid into the Treasury of this country in excess of the proportion which he should have paid as compared with other industries.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. Does the Senator understand, as we have been so frequently told, that a large majority of the farmers of the country are directly back of the equalization plan?

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, there may be some farmers back of it. I do not know. I will say in all sincerity that after two years of travel among the western farmers I have yet my first farmer to find who is in favor of it, except upon the theory that he can not get anything better. I will say, however, that over and over again the farmer has said, and that is the reason why this bill is being supported by the farmer, that he does not believe they can get what they ought to have, and that is remedial legislation, without paying for it. The reason why the farmer is for the bill is that it is the only alternative which he sees of possibly taking care of his situation. Take the proposition to any farmer or any group of farmers who farm, and ask them if they, while paying the taxes which they pay, can keep apace with the other industries of the country by paying for their own remedial legislation, and they will tell you distinctly how they feel about it. If a man can not get justice he may be willing to take much less and that much less may be very unjust.

Mr. President, suppose the farmer is, so far as he understands it, in favor of the proposition, the question is how does it appeal to us as legislators? I would like to ask Senators who are supporting the bill how it appeals to them to impose upon the farmer a burden which we have never presumed to impose upon any set of citizens asking for remedial legislation? The great fight with the farmer is for equality of position in the industrial world. He will continue to pay, after we pass the bill, the same high prices for manufactured goods. He will continue to pay the same high price for every article that goes into his living, with the exception of what he raises. He will continue to pay the same high freight rates. He will be in exactly the same relationship to the world after the bill passes that he was before it passed. In addition to that, he will be paying every charge which a board, in its unlimited discretion, sees fit to impose upon him. He will be subject to a board before whom he can not be heard and from whose decision there is no appeal, and that board will fasten upon him whatever fee it sees fit, and he must pay whether he wins or loses by the experiment.

There is another reason which we ought to consider very carefully. It is almost a certainty that the bill will be vetoed with the equalization fee in it. I state that solely upon the ground of the last veto message and the accompanying statement from the Attorney General. The fair presumption is that the bill will be vetoed upon the theory that the President in all probability has not changed his mind, and in all probability he will not change his position until he does change his mind. If that is true, why not eliminate the questions which justify the veto and pass a bill with an appropriation to test the proposition? If time proves that it is successful, and the farmer still wants his equalization fee instead of an appropriation from the Treasury, perhaps we could get it in the future. It is almost a certainty that we will not get it at the present time. But if later the farmer still yearns to pay this fee, perhaps such privilege might be granted.

So, I say, how are we going to place the cotton raisers upon an equality with the manufacturers and make them pay for their legislation? How are we going to place the wheat grower upon a level with the manufacturer when the manufacturer gets his protection free and the farmer must pay for his protection? We are embedding and incorporating and driving into the legal system of the country a recognized principle of discrimination against one class of people, and we will regret it if the Supreme Court should go the full distance which it started upon yesterday and hold that we have no Constitution at all. It is unjust to the farmer; it continues his inequality. He asks for bread and you give him a stone. I insist we ought to do for the farmer what we profess to do—give him equality.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, when the Senator asked me yesterday whether I would vote for an appropriation, I had another matter in mind. I thought the Senator had in mind an appropriation to experiment upon legislation of this sort. I did not understand that he was offering an appropriation to make any experiment as to what the farmer might be able to do. If that is the case, we have incidents which are in favor of it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I would like to inquire of the Senator from Idaho if he has offered an amendment with reference to the equalization fee? If he desires a bill with that provision stricken out, will he offer an amendment to that effect?

Mr. BORAH. I would vote for the bill and I would support it, if the equalization fee were stricken out. I have not prepared an amendment. I can do so. After I looked over the amendments which have been offered to-day, it is, in my opinion, a very slight step from the amendments which have been offered to the elimination of the equalization fee. It will require very little effort, in my judgment, to eliminate it. If I find any considerable support for it, I shall offer such an amendment. I shall not if I find no considerable support.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Idaho a question. What suggestion would the Senator offer or what amendment would the Senator offer to take the other step?

Mr. BORAH. All we have to do is, by appropriate language, to increase the appropriation and to eliminate section 8.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I want to speak but briefly, inasmuch as others are desirous of speaking. I discussed the bill quite at length when the matter was before the Senate last week.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], in his very able way, has presented a problem or two which have been given very serious consideration by the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and by farm groups generally. It is very enticing to say that by removing the equalization fee the taxpayers of the country should take care of all losses that may be incident to the operations of the board. That would be a subsidy pure and simple. I do not know of a farm organization, outside of the Grange, that has asked for a subsidy. The farmers of the country, represented by the heads of their organizations and through meetings, have all decided that they would rather have a long-time permanent policy, to which they could turn and which they could invoke when needed, rather than a short-time plan of a subsidy which is nothing but a draft upon the Treasury of the United States.

Of course, indeed, it is alluring to talk about the Treasury taking up these losses; but everyone knows who has followed the attitude of the President of the United States that he has repeatedly said that he would veto a subsidy or any draft upon the Treasury of the United States. I feel as morally certain as anyone could feel that if any bill carried a provision such as suggested by the Senator from Idaho, it would meet with prompt rebuke by the President of the United States. The bill now before us may be vetoed; I do not know; but the farmers of the country realize that if they should come to Congress and ask Congress for aid, as suggested by the distinguished Senator from Idaho, and would accept out of the Treasury of the United States, paid into it by the taxpayers of the country, annual losses accruing from the sale of their surplus products in foreign markets or from withholding their products, there would be such a protest go over the country against a subsidy in that form that this legislative structure would fall upon the heads of the farmers themselves. It is in order to avoid that catastrophe that the farmers have agreed to pay, by way of an equalization fee, a small portion of the benefit they will receive.

Mr. President, the argument of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is captivating but not logical. He is wrong, I think, in this. He has stated that the farmer by virtue of the levy of an equalization fee will be required to pay for a benefit which the manufacturer receives without compensation. I say that is not correct.

The manufacturer when he finds himself producing a surplus sells it abroad at the world's price level as advantageously as he can, and takes his loss. His profits are made in the domestic market, enjoying the higher level of prices. There is many a manufacturer who, finding himself unable to take full advantage of the protective tariff, must sell his surplus abroad. He sells it at that time on the competitive world market and upon the competitive plane of prices. That manufacturer in many instances loses money on the products he sells in the foreign countries; in any event, it is a reduced profit which he receives, his main profit being that which he realizes from the sale of his products in the protected home market of America. His equalization fee is paid by himself through personal losses or corporation losses. The losses he suffers are in principle as much an equalization fee as is the equalization fee which the farmers as a group must pay for their losses.

Hence, Mr. President anyone who understands the principles of economics and the rules which guide business men, must know that when a manufacturer sells abroad, the world price being less than the domestic price, made so by the tariff, he always suffers a loss. Hence the protection he receives under the tariff is bought at the price of receiving a lower sum for the goods which he sells abroad. So, by protecting our domestic market against competition and making available the protective tariff, behind whose wall the manufacturer produces and sells at a profit, the manufacturer is willing, and properly so, to make up the losses because of the benefit he receives. The farmer knows if the equalization fee should be destroyed, that any structure which Congress may build must fall.

I want to say to the Senator from Idaho——

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield to me?

Mr. McNARY. I will yield in just a moment. I want to say to the Senator from Idaho that, as one, I am not afraid, as an experiment, for Congress to take out of the Treasury certain sums of money that might make up the losses occasioned by selling in foreign markets or by withholding cotton for orderly marketing in order that the world price may be influenced. I even went so far, and farther than my distinguished friend, as to prepare a bill along that line.

I found that proposal of mine did not meet with approval among the farmers of the country nor did it meet with the approval among the administration heads. So I fell back upon the other proposal, namely, that the equalization fee was the only practicable way over a long period of time to take advantage of the tariff.

Mr. President, speaking as one who has had a little experience and one who has received many communications and messages from farmers and farm groups throughout the country, I desire to say I have no doubt that if this bill should be amended—and it would not hurt my feelings personally—so as to eliminate the equalization fee, it would not be acceptable to the farmers of the country, because they do not want to become objects of charity; they do not want to ask Congress annually to put up a large sum of money to take up their losses. They realize, Mr. President, that unless they carry this burden themselves this legislation would be of short duration. They are asking for machinery which they can operate and for which they can pay. All losses and charges incident to the handling of their annual crops they are anxious to pay for upon the theory and upon the substantial and sincere belief that that is the only way to bring about permanent legislation.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator from Oregon will bear in mind that when we put a bounty on sugar it was because in this country we produced no sugar. The object of the bounty was to stimulate domestic production. What does the Senator think would be the effect of putting a bounty or a subsidy upon products which we already overproduce? What would be the effect of a direct bounty on a surplus?

Mr. McNARY. That is one of the plans which have been suggested by the National Grange, which is known as the debenture plan.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator at this point?

Mr. McNARY. If I may be pardoned to answer the question of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Georgia, and perhaps to yield the floor.

The plan referred to by the Senator from Connecticut is the plan which has been proposed by the National Grange, with which I have no quarrel; but, Mr. President, I have not known, through many years of actual experience, where the farmers of the country or groups of farmers have ever favored any legislation that even winked at a subsidy; and I have seen the farm leaders throughout the country oppose in all its vicious forms legislation that carried a subsidy or assistance from the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. President, if they are to be consistent, if they are to follow that precedent and tradition which they have established for themselves, can they come here and ask Congress to appropriate $50,000,000 or $100,000,000 or $500,000,000 or $600,000,000 to take up the losses which they have incurred by reason of overproduction? I think it is entirely to their credit; I think no more glorious tribute can be paid to the farmers of the country than to say that they are willing to take up all the losses themselves for the benefit they will receive, and not ask for an appropriation from the Congress.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. McNARY. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. I am not so much concerned over the constitutionality of this bill, I will say to the Senator, as I am with regard to its effect. I do not want to vote for a proposal that will remove the farmer from the frying pan and place him in the fire. I do not think the frying pan is quite so hot as it is said to be, but I do not want to make it any hotter than it is. I have been told that the purpose of the equalization fee was to encourage a restriction of production.

Mr. McNARY. Oh, Mr. President, I do not think the Senator quite entertains that idea.

Mr. McLEAN. I have been told so by gentlemen who are deeply interested in this bill.

Mr. McNARY. No; Mr. President, the Senator knows the purpose of the equalization fee is to prevent losses.

Mr. McLEAN. The way to prevent loss lies in reducing production, does it not?

Mr. McNARY. If the Senator will permit me to make a full answer, I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. McLEAN. I shall be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. McNARY. The only purpose of the equalization fee is, of course, to take up the losses that accrue from overproduction—I will not say overproduction, but a surplus which must move to a lower price level in foreign countries—and to make the tariff applicable to the farmers of the country.

Secondly, Mr. President, it will have, it is thought by those who have given some study to this bill, a deterrent effect upon overproduction, because as the surplus increases so does the equalization fee. If there are 200,000,000 bushels surplus to sell, the equalization fee would be twice as much as if there were only 100,000,000 bushels to sell. It is supposed, therefore, that it will be a deterrent against overproduction.

Mr. McLEAN. That is just what I thought.

Mr. McNARY. Furthermore, there is in the bill this year a provision which was not in any of its predecessors, to the effect that if there is overproduction in violation of the program prepared by the farm board the board will not operate through marketing agreements as to that particular product. That is the second deterrent against overproduction.

Mr. McLEAN. Then the Senator admits that if we are to control the price of a product it is important that we should control the quantity produced and the quantity consumed.

Mr. McNARY. That is academic, of course.

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; and I assume that was one of the reasons why the equalization fee was put in this bill.

However, the Senator has not answered my first question, which was, What effect does he think the granting of a bounty or a subsidy would have upon the quantity produced?

Mr. McNARY. I did not understand the Senator propounded that question.

Mr. McLEAN. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. I presume without the two deterrents in this bill to which I have just referred, there would be caused an increase in production. If unrestrained and unrestricted by any agency or principle at all, I suspect, in that event, there would be an increase in production.

Mr. McLEAN. As we have had a surplus of wheat in this country for more than a century, with one year's exception, how many years of surplus does the Senator think the Treasury could afford if it provided a direct bounty?

Mr. McNARY. I do not think the farmers of this country want the Treasury to stand one penny.

Mr. CARAWAY addressed the Chair.

Mr. McNARY. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. I beg pardon; I thought the Senator had concluded.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. McNARY. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. In all the legislation which has been passed by Congress, some of which has been adverted to during the course of the debate, has there ever previously been an instance where the beneficiaries of the legislation came forward and proposed out of their own pockets to bear whatever loss might be sustained through the operation of the law?

Mr. McNARY. I think history may be searched in vain to find a parallel; there is no such instance.

Mr. CARAWAY obtained the floor.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon a question or two, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. CARAWAY. Certainly; I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator says that a direct appropriation would be a matter of charity. I want to ask him if it was not a matter of charity when $529,000,000 was appropriated directly out of the Treasury of the United States to pay the railroads their war-time profits after they were turned back?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I can answer that by saying that I voted against the Esch-Cummins Act.

Mr. BROOKHART. Very well. Is it not a charity when the protected industries come along and ask Congress to enact a law putting on a protective tariff that will raise the price on the whole community, and transferring the profits of that price into the pockets of the manufacturers of the country? Is not that a charity out of the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. McNARY. No, Mr. President. I am a strong advocate of a protective tariff. I think we all recognize that if we are to have a higher standard of living in this country, we must protect ourselves from the cheaper labor found in the Orient and in Europe.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator, then, is in favor of that form of public charity?

Mr. McNARY. That is not public charity; that is protection against a lower standard of living; and by this bill I propose to do for agriculture that which we have heretofore done for industry.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. BROOKHART. Is it a charity when the laws and the courts award a return to the capital invested in public utilities generally, say, of 7 per cent, when the people as a whole can only produce 5½ per cent?

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to answer that question?

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, we can not settle this question of railroad subsidies, nor can we agree about the tariff. My friend from Connecticut yesterday said that they had a tariff in order to stimulate competition. I have heard a great many statements of why we enacted a protective tariff, but that was a new one. In other words, they did not have enough competition, and they got a high tariff so that they would have more.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption there?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. McLEAN. I think the Senator from North Carolina yesterday gave us an illustration which very fairly and conclusively presents the tariff question as it is involved in this discussion. It will take only a minute for me to call it to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. CARAWAY. I hope the Senator from Connecticut is not going to make the speech of the Senator from North Carolina over for him.

Mr. McLEAN. It was a very interesting speech, and I was very glad to have it in the RECORD.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not correct it, but I suppose it is correct.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator said that the manufacturers of cotton cloth in North Carolina, by reason of the proximity of the raw material and the somewhat lower wages, and the fact that they had nonunion employees——

Mr. SIMMONS. Open shop.

Mr. McLEAN. Open shop—were enabled to produce this article cheaper than it could be done in New England. As we all know, the cotton-cloth manufacturers in New England have been suffering a serious period of depression. The cotton-cloth manufacturers of New England have the tariff, just the same as the farmer; but it so happens that North Carolina can produce cotton cloth cheaper than it can be produced in New England.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not think we should go into the cotton tariff at this time.

Mr. McLEAN. I hope the Senator will pardon me just for a minute or two.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator from Arkansas permit me to say a word in reply?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield the floor.

Mr. McLEAN. I am very much obliged to the Senator. I will accept his offer. Now, you see, we have precisely this position——

Mr. SIMMONS. I was going to ask the Senator from Arkansas to permit me to reply briefly to the Senator from Connecticut. I did not want to take the Senator from the floor.

Mr. CARAWAY. That was entirely irrelevant to the question we were going to discuss.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am willing to agree to abandon the floor.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; I will abandon it.

Mr. McLEAN. I shall not occupy the floor more than a minute. I should like to conclude my statement; that is all.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to ask the Senator from Connecticut if he proposes to apply the protective tariff as between the States of the Union?

Mr. McLEAN. That is precisely the point I was coming to, and I should like to call it to the attention of the Senate.

We have the cotton-cloth producers in New England in precisely the same position that the farmers are in. They have a foreign tariff, but it does not protect them. The farmer has his tariff on wheat, but it does not protect him. Now, the farmers in North Carolina are in bad shape, and the Senator from North Carolina, who was born and bred a low-tariff man, takes the floor of this Chamber and says that he wants the farmers in North Carolina protected against competition emanating from the farmers of South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have said nothing of the kind, and nothing that could be construed into anything of the kind. I have known the fact for the last 30 or 40 years that North Carolina has to grow cotton in competition with Texas and that Texas could produce a bale of cotton for much less than it costs to produce a bale of cotton in North Carolina.

Mr. McLEAN. That is very true. I do not think the Senator understood my statement, however.

The situation is precisely this: We have a tariff to protect us against ruinous foreign competition, and I hope we shall continue to have it; but now the proposal is to protect the farmers of one State against the competition emanating from the farmers of other States, and I confess this is the first time I have ever heard that proposed from the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. EDGE. In other words, that is a system of protection.

Mr. McLEAN. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. McLEAN. I should like to conclude.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. McLEAN. As I have said, I wish we could discover some way to help the farmer; but the proposal of the Senators who advocate this legislation is to help the farmer by giving him protection against domestic competition. That means that they want to discover ways and means to take care of a domestic surplus. There is only one way that you can do that, and that is by controlling the amount produced and the amount consumed; and if you think you can do it by putting a bounty or a subsidy on a surplus, you will find yourselves drowned in your own stew.

That is all I have to say on the subject.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, when the farm relief bill was formerly before the Senate I argued that question at length. I insisted then that all that was demanded was the control of the surplus of such crops as otherwise would be put upon the basis of the world's price. That was my contention then, and that is my contention now—that this bill will be invoked for the benefit of those products which otherwise, because of their surplus, would be put upon the basis of the world's price.

I want to say to the Senator from Connecticut that in this particular instance the farmers are not attempting to protect themselves by a tariff against the products of other sections or other industries, but they are simply attempting to do a thing that is calculated and intended to enable them to obtain for their products a reasonable price upon the basis of the American market price.

Mr. McLEAN. To save themselves from the effect of domestic competition.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now the Senator says that we are combining against the balance of the community, and we are setting up what is substantially a protective tariff of one section against another section. We are doing nothing of the kind.

The effect of the tariff that has been enacted and is now upon the statute books would be to bring about competition between the manufacturers of the country, but for the fact that the manufacturers of this country protect themselves against that domestic competition by either combining themselves into a trust or covering themselves with a trust and price agreement by which they practically do not compete with each other at all.

When I first began to study the tariff, a great argument made by the Republican Party in support of the protective tariff was that it would result in forcing the manufacturers to compete in the home market and the result of that would be that the people would get the benefit of competitive prices; but then along came the trusts, and these industries entered into these trust arrangements by which they protected themselves against domestic competition, and that argument in favor of the protective tariff has not been used in recent years.

We passed trust legislation; but everybody knows that that legislation has been so attenuated by the decisions of the courts that it has practically no effect at this time, and that the great majority of the industries of this country are operated not upon a basis of domestic competition, but upon a price-fixing basis, prices fixed by themselves, with the price so fixed as not to contravene the decisions of the Supreme Court. I think that is true with reference to practically all the great industries.

I can not see any just ground for the industries opposing this legislation. I can not see any basis upon which the Senator from Connecticut can oppose this legislation, except that the industries already protected, already enjoying through the trusts and combinations a guaranty against domestic competition—protected, therefore, against foreign competition and protected against domestic competition—are insisting that agriculture shall not enjoy like benefits; for what reason? For the reason that they fear that it will impair the value to them of the special privilege they have been able to obtain for themselves by legislation and favorable administration, and it might increase their costs.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator puts his opposition upon that ground, I can understand it; and I believe that nine-tenths of the opposition to this bill coming from the industrial States, such as that represented by the Senator, comes from the apprehension of the manufacturers that the farmer having been given this aid—that is, having been allowed by this process to get some advantage of an increase in price, so that that price will be something like commensurate with the prices of the things he has to buy—that will result in an increase in the cost of labor by increasing the cost of living.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not think the Senator means to insinuate that there is anybody in this country who does not want to see agriculture prosper. I do not believe there is. I do not believe there is a Member of this body who does not want to see the farmer prosper.

Mr. SIMMONS. Why, then, does the Senator object to a proposition the purpose of which is, and the effect of which will probably be, to increase to some extent the prices of agricultural products?

Mr. McLEAN. I am trying to make it clear to the Senator. The Senator said that the manufacturers can combine, or enter into agreements, whereby they can control their surplus. The Senator knows that the New England manufacturers of cotton goods can not combine with the manufacturers of North Carolina, and as a consequence the manufacturers of cotton goods in New England are going out of business. The only way they can control their surplus is to close their mills. That is so with a great many producers in this country, corporations; we have been told many times that more than 40 per cent of the corporations of this country are doing business at a loss.

The point I wanted to call to the attention of the Senator—and I do not think he has caught it yet, and if he will pardon me I will repeat it—is this, that the cotton manufacturers in New England and the farmers have a tariff. Every bushel of wheat that comes into this country pays the tariff, and every yard of cotton cloth that comes into this country pays the tariff. Unfortunately, that tariff is not high enough to protect the New England manufacturers because of the competition in North Carolina. So that the New England manufacturers of cotton cloth are on precisely the same basis as the farmers in the Senator's State.

The cotton-cloth manufacturers of the country, and those who are making other goods, realize that they can not come to Congress and ask Congress to take care of them, and by granting them an indirect bounty enable them to continue in business at a profit. That is what the farmers want. They have a domestic surplus. They claim the tariff does not benefit them. They want help. They want to control and dispose of that surplus. I would like to see it done. The only point I make is that you can not do it by artificially raising the price.

The Senator knows that every bushel of wheat grown in the country is a part of the surplus as it affects the price, and my belief is that when you attempt this legislation you will encourage rather than discourage overproduction.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McLEAN. I yield the floor.

Mr. GOODING. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but I want to say to him that if the farmer should get the world price for wheat plus tariff protection of 42 cents he yet would not be getting the cost of production as found by the Government itself in its investigation. So that he is not going to get enough of an increase in price to bring about the great overproduction the Senator fears at all. He would not get the cost of production if he had all that. The actual cost of production as found by the Government was $1.48 for the Northwestern States, as against Canada.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator does not want Congress to appropriate just enough money to enable the farmer to continue in business at a loss, does he?

Mr. GOODING. The farmer is willing to take care of that if we will give him an opportunity, and he has made up his mind what farm legislation he wants. For four years now the Committees on Agriculture of the Senate and House have been considering this legislation.

Mr. McLEAN. I realize that.

Mr. GOODING. And during that time every farm organization in America has been before those two committees, and, without exception, they have gone on record for this bill. The Grange now would prefer a direct subsidy, and perhaps a lot of other farmers prefer that.

Mr. McLEAN. What does the Senator think would be the effect of a bounty on the surplus?

Mr. GOODING. It would be disastrous; there is no doubt about that. That is just exactly what a subsidy would be, because there would not be any responsibility on the part of the farmer; it would be all on the Government.

Mr. McLEAN. How much more disastrous would a direct subsidy be that raised the price of wheat 30 cents a bushel than an indirect equalization fee that would raise the price 30 cents a bushel.

Mr. GOODING. They are altogether different, because the farmer has to tax himself in order to get 30 cents a bushel.

Mr. McLEAN. If he is making 30 cents a bushel——

Mr. GOODING. But he is not getting the cost of production of a bushel of wheat, as found by the Government itself; and I rather think that it was a rather conservative investigation, because a part of the Tariff Commission at that time was not very friendly as far as the tariff was concerned, and the commissioners themselves divided. A part of the commission wanted a still higher cost of production and believed that the investigation found it, but the majority of the commission decided that 42 cents was the difference between the cost of production of a bushel of wheat in this country and in Canada.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, if the farmer needed 50 cents or 60 cents a bushel—whatever he might need for his protection I would be glad to give to him.

Mr. GOODING. All right; if the Senator will give him the tariff, that is all he wants.

Mr. McLEAN. I would be glad to give it to him against foreign competition.

Mr. GOODING. That is all he is asking for, and he can not get it.

Mr. McLEAN. As long as he has a domestic surplus, it is going to be very difficult for him to get that benefit by legislation that will invite an increase in production.

Mr. GOODING. Let me show the Senator the effect if this bill shall pass with the equalization fee, and in my judgment it can not be passed without the fee; and do not forget that this fight is going on. The farmer has his back to the wall and he has to fight for his very existence. You have created a new civilization through legislation, you have created an increased cost of production that he could not meet, and you can not do him any good unless you give him an increased price to meet that increased cost of production. That is what he is fighting for. The farmer is fighting to do business along the same lines along which great industries are doing business, by the same methods: that is all. If this bill passes it gives him a board of directors that will transact his business for him.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, what is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STEIWER in the chair). The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. WATSON. Is there not some amendment pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. WATSON. Then let us go on and pass the bill.

Mr. WATERMAN. Mr. President, I offer two interrelated amendments to the pending bill, which I send to the desk that they may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the proposed amendments.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 27, line 23, after the abbreviation and numerals, to wit, "Sec. 17," insert "(a)"; also on page 28, after line 2, insert:

(b) None of the provisions of an act of the Congress of the United States entitled "An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1906, or any amendments thereto, shall hereafter be held or construed by any person or any official of any department of the Government of the United States or in any court to embrace, or to be in any way applicable to any fresh or natural fruit in the condition when severed from the tree, vine, or bush upon which it was grown.

Mr. WATERMAN. Mr. President, these amendments are, first, merely for the purpose of designating the first subdivision of a certain section, and, second, an addition of a provision which takes out from under the pure food act of 1906 fruit in its natural condition when removed from the tree or shrub upon which it was grown. It will be extremely beneficial to the fruit growers of the West and relieve them from a burden under which they have been suffering now for the last five or six years.

I understand that the Senator in charge of the pending bill does not object to the amendments.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I do not want to be classified quite in that way. I do not think the amendments really can find their proper place in a bill of this kind. However, I am willing, so far as I can, to consider the matter in conference and will not oppose the amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 5, strike out line 17 and down through the period in line 1 on page 6, and insert in lieu thereof:

SEC. 4. (a) Whenever the board determines that any agricultural commodity may thereafter require stabilization by the board through marketing agreements authorized by this act, or whenever the cooperative associations, or other organizations representative of the producers of the commodity, shall apply to the board for the creation and appointment of the advisory council for such commodity, then the board shall notify the President of such determination or application. The President shall thereupon create an advisory council for the commodity. The advisory council shall be composed of seven members to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. No individual shall be eligible for appointment to a commodity advisory council unless he resides in the region in which the commodity is principally grown, and is a producer of the commodity. Prior to the making of any appointment to a commodity advisory council, the board shall transmit to the President for his consideration lists of individuals qualified for appointment, to be submitted to the board by cooperative associations or other organizations representative of the producers of the commodity. The term of office of a member of any commodity advisory council shall be two years. In the event of a vacancy occurring, the President shall fill such vacancy in the same manner as the originally appointed member, and, should Congress not be in session, such appointee shall hold office until 20 days after the convening of the next session of Congress.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in reference to this amendment, about which there was some discussion this morning, I desire to say that under the original bill this advisory council was to be appointed by the board. Under the theory of the bill it was to be purely an advisory council. It was to have no power. It was merely to advise the board.

Some of us thought that, inasmuch as the advisory council would represent the producers, it ought to have some real authority. For instance, take as an illustration, the case of cotton. Out of a board of 13 the cotton people could not reasonably hope to have more than 3 members of the board. So, if the bill had been allowed to remain just as it was, without amendment in this particular, this board of 13 would have had complete control of the cotton situation in the event of a marketing period, although there were but three people, or perhaps but two people, on the board who were favorable to cotton.

The advisory council was to be just what the language indicated, and nothing more. It was to have no power to advise the board and compel the board to take its advice. The board would create it, and it is fair to believe that it would not take a position that was antagonistic to the board creating it.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. I have read this amendment for the first time to-day, and have followed the explanation of the Senator. In effect, would it not really transfer all the real power from the board, as constituted under the original McNary-Haugen bill, to the separate advisory boards?

Mr. McKELLAR. Quite the contrary. It would not transfer any administrative power from the board to the commodity council. Every power of administration would still be in the hands of the board, but when it came to the particular commodity, before the board could act, it must have the approval of four out of the seven members of the advisory board, and virtually it would mean exactly this: We can not have a law enacted by the House of Representatives. It has to be approved also by the Senate. If it is a wise provision in our own Government to have two bodies approve an act, why would it not be a wise thing to have the board here in Washington receive the approval of those engaged in producing the particular agricultural commodity?

Mr. EDGE. I am not so sure that that would not be entirely justifiable, but am I to understand that when the advisory council, for instance, using cotton as an illustration, representing that commodity, decided by a majority vote that the equalization fee should be undertaken or instituted or the surplus purchased, their finding is mandatory on the board?

Mr. McKELLAR. It can be done in two ways. The board can institute the marketing period itself or the cooperative organizations can make application to have the advisory council appointed; and after it is appointed, of course, the marketing period can not be put into effect unless it receives the approval of the council.

Mr. EDGE. Yes; the Senator used the illustration, and I think it is a very good one, of the Congress, in that both Houses must, on their own account, entirely within their own judgment, act affirmatively before a bill can finally go to the President. What I am asking is whether the board has any jurisdiction to veto the advisory council if the advisory council for wheat should say "We want the terms of this bill now put into effect and administered"?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, it can not be put into effect without a majority vote of the board.

Mr. EDGE. As well as a majority vote of the council?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; that is true.

Mr. EDGE. I am very glad to get that information because, comparing the amendment with the original bill, it occurred to me that the amendment removes that authority from the board.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; it does not do it at all.

Mr. EDGE. As a matter of fact, what is the object of the advisory council if, after they had decided affirmatively to administer the act with respect to the equalization fee, the general board of 13 could veto or vote "nay"? Then the advisory council would mean practically nothing.

Mr. McKELLAR. Here is what it means: Suppose the board of 13, here in Washington, determines to put into operation a marketing period for cotton. Suppose those interested in the production of cotton did not want it to go into effect. They would have their council here, and before the board can put the marketing period into operation the board must have the approval of four out of the seven members of the commodity council or advisory council.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator is entirely sure he is correct?

Mr. McKELLAR. Absolutely.

Mr. EDGE. I know the Senator is correct in what he just stated, but would the same condition reversed apply? If the advisory council decided that the equalization of cotton should be undertaken through the purchase of cotton, or whatever form it might require, and the general board of 13 in their judgment felt that it was not wise or justifiable to do it, could the board take that position?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; it could not go into effect then at all.

Mr. SMITH. There is no power given the advisory council to initiate any marketing period. That is wholly with the board. The board can initiate a marketing period, but the advisory council can not. Under the terms of the amendment offered the advisory council, when the board thinks there is a marketing period advisable, can veto it as to that particular commodity.

Mr. EDGE. And the board could veto their initiation?

Mr. McKELLAR. The council can not initiate at all.

Mr. SMITH. No; the advisory council can not initiate at all.

Mr. EDGE. Under the amendment they can not?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; they can not. They have no power of initiation at all. Let me say to the Senator from New Jersey that the advisory council has no power at all except the power to veto when a marketing period is about to go into effect or when an attempt is made to take a commodity out from a marketing period. Suppose the board wanted to take it out of the marketing period for another year, the council would have the right to prevent that, and that is all it would have in this particular aspect of the matter.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I would like to know how long the advisory board could keep this up? Could it be done for several years?

Mr. McKELLAR. How does the Senator mean?

Mr. HARRIS. If the advisory board decided not to have an equalization fee plan put into effect for five years, could that be done?

Mr. McKELLAR. The advisory board is selected or appointed for only two years.

Mr. HARRIS. Yes; I understand; but could it keep up its refusal or its agreement with reference to the marketing period for an indefinite time?

Mr. McKELLAR. The advisory council would have the right of veto, representing the producer. They must be appointed from among the producers. They must be appointed from the territory where the product is principally raised, and during that time they would, of course, have the right of veto on putting the market period into effect.

Mr. HARRIS. But it is indefinite as to the length of time it might be kept up by the board?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, if we can not trust the farmers themselves, who are not only the producers themselves but the representatives of the producers, I can not imagine whom we could trust.

Mr. HARRIS. Then it could go on indefinitely?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes. So far as the amendment is concerned that is about all there is to it. It seems to me it strengthens the bill and adds to it very greatly. It certainly protects the producers of the country.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that one thing that makes the amendment necessary in the form in which it is presented is the modification of subsequent amendments which give to the advisory council an absolute, positive power which it did not have under the original form of the bill, and widens its scope in that it can be selected not only from the cooperative organizations or an organization of farmers but from any group of individuals who are engaged in the production of the article that is to be affected by the action of the marketing period. As these radical changes were made in subsequent amendments, it was necessary to clothe them with the power of real appointees, by and with the consent of the Senate, as indicated in the amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Senator is entirely right about it. As I said, I think the amendment not only protects the farmer but strengthens the bill. It is in entire accord with our institutions. It is patterned somewhat after the formation of Congress itself, there being two boards, and two are better than one under the circumstances. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I do not rise to discuss the amendment, but I would not want to have a vote taken in the absence of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY].

Mr. McKELLAR. I would not either, and I have sent for him.

Mr. McNARY and Mr. EDGE suggested the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Copeland	Harris	Neely
Barkley	Couzens	Hawes	Norbeck
Bayard	Curtis	Hayden	Oddie

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, at the request of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], I desire to ask unanimous consent that this amendment may be passed over until tomorrow morning. I hope that request will meet with the approval of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. McNARY. I am quite well satisfied to let that course be pursued.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote cast earlier in the day by which the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] was adopted. The language of the amendment is as follows:

> The words "agricultural commodity" mean an agricultural commodity which is not a fruit or a vegetable.

The adoption of this amendment excludes every fruit grower and every vegetable raiser in the United States from participating in the benefits of the pending bill. The fruit growers of West Virginia, for example, do not want to be subject to the bill's provisions relative to equalization fees and marketing agreements for the very sufficient reason that fruit is perishable, and accordingly not susceptible of being indefinitely stored like wheat or corn or cotton. But the fruit growers and vegetable raisers do want the benefits of the other provisions of the bill.

In my opinion, the Senate adopted the Copeland amendment without fully appreciating its prejudicial effects upon a very large and deserving class of farmers. Therefore I move that the vote by which the amendment was agreed to be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, in lieu of the Copeland amendment, on page 18, after line 25, I propose that the following new paragraph be inserted:

> 8. The provisions of this bill relative to marketing agreements and equalization fees shall not be construed to apply to fresh fruits or vegetables.

Mr. President, the adoption of this amendment will at once give the vegetable growers and the fruit raisers all of the benefits of the bill and protect them against the exactions of the equalization fee and marketing agreement provisions of the measure. I request a vote on my amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the substitute amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia in lieu of the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I arose a few moments ago to discuss one provision of the pending bill and to attempt to reply to a suggestion made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who is not now on the floor. I wished to urge why, to the friends of the measure, an equalization fee instead of an appropriation to absorb losses would seem to be economically wise. If we should pass a bill carrying a large appropriation from the Public Treasury for the purpose of absorbing losses, it, of course, would invite overproduction; when the appropriation should be exhausted there would be no way to replenish it except to go back to the source, which is the Treasury.

The equalization fee, Mr. President, as I have understood it, is for this purpose: We are seeking to find some means by which farmers may cooperate. Voluntary cooperative associations have found themselves confronted with a situation where 8 or 10 per cent of the producers of a commodity will form themselves into an association and withhold their products from the market, that when a temporary rise in the price of the product the other producers, who are not members of the association, will avail themselves of the temporary rise, obtain all the advantages, and in the last analysis leave the surplus of the product in the hands of the cooperatives. Inevitably such cooperative associations fail, because 8 or 10 per cent of an industry can not support the 90 per cent who refuse to cooperate. The equalization fee is intended to induce every man to cooperate, because the 90 per cent who refused to cooperate in the past did so because they wanted to bear none of the burdens of cooperation. If, however, the hand of the law lays itself upon the product and says, "Whether you cooperate or do not cooperate, the cost of maintaining a market will fall equally upon you as upon those who are in the association," necessarily 100 per cent cooperation will follow. That is the dream of those who sponsor this proposed legislation. If it shall fail, the system will fail.

If cooperation be the solution of the farmer's problem—and we have been told by the enemies of the farmer and the friends of the farmer that cooperation means his success—the equalization fee is the instrumentality that will bring about that result. It will enable the industry to be levied upon as a whole to take care of the surplus; it will make the unwilling, the selfish who want to stand on the outside and take advantage of the sacrifices of those others who are engaged in the same industry contribute their proportionate part of the cost, and, therefore, they too will cooperate. If it does not do that, the scheme of this legislation fails; and if we shall strike out the equalization fee then there would be no power to compel anybody to cooperate. The bill would then simply set up another instrumentality by means of which the farmers may find themselves deeper and deeper in debt every year, and if we should permit them to take their losses from the Treasury it would be in fact allowing them to go into bankruptcy and to liquidate in that way every year. No farmer wants to do that. There may be industries that are willing that the American public shall finance their losses; there are people who are willing that the Treasury of the country shall be called upon to reimburse them for their mistakes. Agriculture is not of that class.

For the first time we find a group of men in the Senate and in the House of Representatives who are determined to deny to an industry the right to organize for its protection. That is all the farmer seeks. He asks the Congress to give him an instrumentality by means of which 100 per cent of cooperation among the producers in that industry may be brought about. Some Members of the Congress would deny that to him, although he does not ask to be given one dollar to finance this undertaking, but asks only to have given to him the legal machinery by means of which the farmers may bring about this result.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. Is the purport of the Senator's argument to the effect that this measure is to bring about compulsory cooperation?

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator is fond of the word "compulsory," it is to bring about cooperation, because it is designed to set up a machine that will make cooperation possible. If that is "compulsion," has the Senator any objection to it?

Mr. BLAINE. I might ask this question——

Mr. CARAWAY Very well.

Mr. BLAINE. Who is to be the judge of whether it is going to be profitable or not—the Congress or the farmers after they have been forced into this cooperation?

Mr. CARAWAY. That goes back to the question of whether one is in favor of any law. We have not a perfect democracy; the people do not meet together and enact their laws; they have representatives who have to say what, in their judgment, is a wise course. I know and the Senator knows that we never can get 100 per cent of cooperation among farmers so long as some of those engaged in an industry may stay out and wait until others shall make a market, and then scalp it, leaving this to be borne by those in whose hands the surplus will be left. That is the only question involved, namely, whether we shall so legislate that all may be compelled to bear equally the losses and share equally in the profits of an industry; in other words, whether we want to make it impossible for cooperation to be brought about in this country among those engaged in producing agricultural commodities.

Mr. BLAINE. If I understand the Senator's argument, his proposition is to impose upon the farmer an equalization fee to force him into cooperation.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator could not have misunderstood me. I said that the design of this proposed law was to make the man who did not want to cooperate bear his part of the cost of cooperation. That is the purpose of the bill. If there are Senators who think farmers ought not to be given that right, let them vote against it. That, however, is what the farmers are asking for. There are Senators who think they know better than does the farmer what the farmer wants. If there is no agricultural problem in this country and if the farmers have no need for legislation, if farmers do not want any legislation, let the Senators who entertain that view vote against this measure. Let them back their judgment against the judgment of 30,000,000 American farmers and say to them, "You are a lot of idiots; you do not know what you want; I am your overlord and to your request I say 'no.'" That is the question that is before the Senate. If Senators are willing to say that the American farmers can not be trusted; that they have not sense enough to know what they want; that they have not character enough to be intrusted with the management of their own business, let them say so by voting against this measure. They must admit the farmers have sense enough to know what they want; they have character enough to be trusted with the conduct of their own business, and, therefore, as they are asking for this legislation it will be granted to them, or they must say that the farmer does not know what is the matter with him; he does not need what he seeks. The responsibility, I say, is up to the Senate. The curious thing about it, however, Mr. President, is that the opposition to this proposed legislation comes almost entirely from a group of Senators who have been the most persistent knockers at the doors of Congress for favors for industries that they represent, and so continuously clamored for them that in most cases they have received them; but the minute there is legislation proposed for the farmer they find either that the Constitution or their implacable opposition of governmental aid keeps them from supporting the measure the farmer wants.

The equalization fee is the heart of this legislation, and there is not a Senator on this floor who wants the farmer to succeed who is against the equalization fee. There is not an enemy of this bill on the floor who is not against the equalization fee. Every farmer in America knows that you are hanging your fight on the equalization fee with the hope that you can destroy the legislation.

I always have great respect for a man who has the courage to look the world in the face and say, "I am against you." I have not any great amount of respect for the man who desires to strike out but wants to veil his hand when he wields the dagger.

You are either for the legislation or you are against it; and the Constitution does not stand between a Senator on this floor and the support of this legislation. There are constitutional lawyers in the Senate, and it is interesting to read their predictions in the light of what the Supreme Court has afterwards said about the legislation. If there is anything that you can stake your life on, it is that these professional constitutional lawyers are wrong. They are the only ones that are 100 per cent wrong on every proposition.

As I said a minute ago, what is the use of dodging the issue? You are not fooling any farmer. You are not fooling anybody else. Why do you not say you are for the legislation or that you are against it? If you are against it because you think the farmers have not sense enough to know what they want and have not character enough to be intrusted with the management of their own business, say it. There is not any use to camouflage.

You know it is rather enlightening to examine what we call composite public opinion. There were a group of farmers who met at Ocala, Fla., and put out a platform. The time was if you wanted to convict one of being an idiot or crazy you had but to say he was for the Ocala platform. No court required other proof. It entered the record then that that man was either a fool or crazy. Yet everything they stood for in that platform has been enacted into law and now is looked upon as conservative!

There is a composite opinion among the farmers of America. They may individually be unable to give you an entirely satisfactory reason for some provisions of this legislation, but when you take the legislation they ask for in its entirety you will find that there is much of wisdom in their demands. Why, every one of you who has practiced law—not these constitutional lawyers, but every one of you who has had business in the courts—has been astonished at the wisdom of a jury, the individual members of which you thought would have been incapable of understanding all the intricacies of your case; and yet the composite opinion of that jury was all that the most learned judge could ask. There is a kind of a balance wheel in having a lot of people viewing a question from many different angles, and reaching a conclusion that represents a part of the belief of all of them, and possibly excludes some of the ideas of every one of them.

This legislation is the composite opinion of the American farmer. Of course, that does not include the "farmers" here on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. BROOKHART. The composite opinion of the farmers on the price they should have under this bill, as expressed in the conference of the Corn Belt committee, was by unanimous vote that they should have cost of production plus a 5 per cent return on the capital invested.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. BROOKHART. And that provision is not in this bill.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is the conclusion of the Senator.

Mr. BROOKHART. I was present when it was done.

Mr. CARAWAY. But, I say, the statement that that provision is not in the bill is the conclusion of the Senator. You do not have to write in the bill that you are to guarantee them a certain price for their products; but we are setting up here the machinery which, if it works, will give them that, and give it to them legally, and allow them to keep their self-respect.

Mr. BROOKHART. Instead of the thing the farmers asked, and were united and unanimous on it, we have this in the bill:

> The price at which a surplus or any part thereof is to be purchased or disposed of under any marketing agreement shall not be fixed in such agreement, but all such purchases and disposals shall be made subject to the prevailing competitive conditions of the markets in which they occur.

This is exactly what we have now.

Mr. CARAWAY. And what were you dealing with? Surpluses. We are trying to keep the surplus from destroying the whole product. There is not anybody that can write into any legislation that the surplus shall bring a fixed price unless you resort to the Public Treasury and subsidize that business.

Mr. BROOKHART. That rule could be put in just as well under the equalization fee as under the Public Treasury appropriation. It is immaterial which way the loss would be paid.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator means you could make the equalization fee large enough to cover that?

Mr. BROOKHART. In case you had a loss on disposing of the surplus bought at that price.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; you could take your money out of one pocket and pay yourself in the other pocket with it.

Mr. BROOKHART. Is not that exactly what the equalization fee does?

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, no; that is not what the equalization fee does.

Mr. BROOKHART. The appropriation does not do that. The appropriation takes it out of the pockets of those that have robbed the farmers all these years, and that the Senator admits have robbed the farmers, and gives it back to the farmers; but the Senator's proposition just takes it out of one pocket and puts it into the other.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, well; what is curious about it is that there is not a line even in the Senator's bill which says that this tax shall be put upon certain people. He wants to take his money out of the Treasury; and that money came out of the pockets of the honest and the dishonest alike. If the Senator wants to write a bill to get the money to pay the farmers out of what he calls the people who robbed the Government, why does he not write a bill saying that we shall tax the railroads so much, and the New England tariff-protected industries so much, and out of these industries we will raise a fund to subsidize the farmer? Let us be consistent.

Mr. BROOKHART. We are quite satisfied that the system of taxation, if we do not have the estate tax repealed, does that quite substantially already.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator is satisfied with the present taxation system, then he has misled me.

Mr. BROOKHART. I am very well satisfied with the taxation system the way Congress passed it in 1924, supported by the Senator and supported by the rest of the Democratic side; but when they turned around and emasculated that bill and destroyed its principles, and that fight was led by Senators on the other side, I am not satisfied with that.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator was not here then, and wisdom was absent from the Senate temporarily. The Senator in one breath says he is satisfied with the taxing system as it is, and in the next says the Democrats ruined it, emasculated it; I do not know now just how it is—whether it is an emasculated law or whether it is an entirely satisfactory law.

Mr. BROOKHART. I do not want to charge that altogether to the Democrats, because standpatters on either side of the Chamber look just alike to me.

Mr. CARAWAY. I know; everybody was wrong but the Senator, and he was temporarily absent, and therefore wrong prevailed. That is to be regretted.

None of those questions, Mr. President, are involved in this legislation. There is no use for us to fool ourselves, because we can not fool anybody else, you know; but when passing upon that the funniest thing is that no man makes an argument to you unless he himself would be swayed by that sort of argument, and, therefore, when somebody presents an argument to us that fails to reach us we realize that we are not on the intellectual plane of that person. He is either above us or below us—usually above us, of course. But the question that we are trying to discuss now—I am not trying to discuss all the provisions of the bill, its machinery, which is purely the mechanics of the bill and is not vital—merely represents a compromise with the administration, who for 11 months yet can write his name at the bottom of another composite veto and defeat the will of the people; that is, unless the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] should finally draft him and have him reelected.

I wanted to discuss this one issue, and then I think I shall have said all that I want to say about the matter, Mr. President.

The equalization fee is the means of saying that everybody who is engaged in an industry shall bear his proper porportion of the cost of making that industry successful. It goes just a little beyond that, Mr. President. It so frequently happens, at least in the marketing of cotton—and with that I am more familiar than I am with corn—it so frequently happens that the farmer sells his cotton; and when it is all out of his hands, or the very large proportion of it is out of his hands, the price goes up. Under the provisions of this bill, if the surplus is weighing down the remainder of that product in the hands of the farmer, the speculator, or the spinner who has bought before the decline or bought before the rise, whichever way the situation may be, can not escape contributing to the eventual marketing of the surplus, because if he bought his cotton and has it stored away in his warehouse and it becomes necessary to levy an equalization fee on the product to take care of the surplus, the minute he rolls his bale of cotton out of the warehouse and puts it in interstate or foreign commerce we say to him, "You have to come along here now and pay your part to help support the weight of the surplus of this product. You did not produce it, but you now have it; and we are going to require you to stand shoulder to shoulder with the farmer and help carry the burden of marketing the surplus."

It has another beautiful side to it, Mr. President. There will not be so much incentive to break the price of cotton by people who have cotton or who have future contracts for cotton if you can reach them thus along with the farmer. It is a hundred per cent cooperation in that product. It makes no difference whether it is in the hands of a millman, a speculator, or a producer, everyone is reached who has that product whenever it is necessary to set up the machinery to take care of the surplus.

I suspect that is where some of these shade-tree farmers find their real objection to it.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I want to reply briefly to some of the suggestions of the Senator from Arkansas. I do not think the representatives of the farmers are doing their duty to the farmers when they say that "We have by law taken your money and turned it over to the railroads. We have by law taken your earnings and turned them over to the protective industries."

I am sorry the Vice President is leaving the chair. I want to have something to say about presidential candidates in a minute.

I do not think it is defending the farmer's rights when by law we take the earnings of the farmers and turn them over to the public utilities, when by law we take the earnings of the farmers and turn them over to the patent-protected industries; then, as a result of all these operations of the law, you have injured the farmer and driven him universally to the verge of bankruptcy, then turn around and say it would be charity to do for him by law what you have done for all the other interests.

I think that is a betrayal of the farmers' interests. I do not think it is a fair fight for the farmer. I have made my fight in all my campaigns on the pledge and promise that I would stand for those things. The Republican platform pledges equality to agriculture compared with the other industries of the country. Now, we turn around and seek to carry out that pledge by putting an equalization fee upon the farmer himself. It is not fair, it is not carrying out our pledge, and something is going to happen in connection with the votes of these farmers.

Mr. President, I want now to turn to the subject which I just now suggested. The presidential situation has come into this matter in a remarkable degree and in a very remarkable way.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EDGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. I call the Senator's attention to my remarks of last week, in which I reviewed the remarks of one of the candidates for President, remarks in which he said that this equalization fee was analogous to the Esch-Cummins law, analogous to the Federal reserve act, and analogous to several other legislative acts which gave gratuities to certain interests. I wish the Senator would discuss that.

Mr. BROOKHART. I remember that cost-plus business in the transportation act; but I am not going to disturb that candidate for the Presidency to-day. It is brought up in my mind in another way.

Mr. WATSON (in his seat). I thank the Senator.

Mr. BROOKHART. He thanks me for that. Maybe I will take it up later, but not to-day.

On April 5, the presidential situation was injected into this farm problem in an article printed in the RECORD from Mr. George N. Peek. Mr. George N. Peek claims to be the leader of the farm movement in the United States at this time; he assumes to be. He is not a farmer, of course. He is a banker, appointed by the bankers and interests of that kind. Mr. Peek singles out one presidential candidate, Mr. Hoover.

I am not a supporter of Mr. Hoover; neither am I a supporter of Mr. Peek's candidate; and it is those two candidates whom I want to discuss at this time, and I think I am fairly in position to be an impartial judge, since I support neither of them.

In this statement, after reviewing Mr. Hoover's action in reference to the Wheat Corporation during the war and the control of farm prices, Mr. Peek brings out this conclusion:

> I challenged then, and I challenge now, the economic soundness and the wisdom of the conference recommendations which were Hoover policies. The effect upon American agriculture and business in agricultural districts may be eptiomized as follows:
> Decrease in farm property values between 1920 and 1925, $20,000,000,000.

The fact that farm property decreased $20,000,000,000 I do not dispute. It was charged up here, however, to Mr. Hoover's control of the war prices, whereby they were held down below the prices of other products.

The second item is:

> Increase in farm debt between 1910 and 1925 $12,000,000,000 and further increase between 1920 and 1925, $2,000,000,000.

I am not quite sure about the accuracy of those figures, but I will affirm the fact that there was an immense increase in the farm debt, in spite of the fact that a large part of it was foreclosed.

> Increase in farm bankruptcies, over 1,000 per cent.

I know that was true, while other bankruptcies remained the same.

> Migration from the farm since 1920, 2,000,000 a year.

That is not far from the fact.

> Bank failures.

I will not take up the banks, since that is rather immaterial.

Mr. President, who is this man speaking who is charging up to Mr. Hoover all of this calamity to the farmers of the United States? He is the campaign manager for our distinguished Vice President, Mr. CHARLES G. DAWES, and when we have that fact in view it is of some importance. That is why I hoped the Vice President would remain during this discussion.

How do I happen to know about this campaign-manager business? I will tell you. Mr. Peek interviewed me, and sounded me out on the Vice President as a presidential candidate. I told him he would not do, so far as I was concerned. I said that he was tied into the big banking and oil interests, and things of that kind, in this country; that he was connected directly and by approval with the Federal reserve deflation of the farmers of this country; that when the Federal reserve inflated in 1924, as they generally do just before election, his own brother was the Comptroller of the Currency, and on the board that helped to do it. The Democrats will remember how they ran the prices up just before the election.

I said that as Vice President, when the farm bill was under consideration at the last session, he made an arrangement with the Federal reserve banking crowd, and with the farmers, that he would get a vote on the farm bill, and he put through the McFadden bill, which made permanent the iniquities of this Federal reserve deflation. Then, when this present farm bill itself came up before the Senate, we find a provision in it protecting the packers and the millers of this country. Let us read that provision:

> (f) During a marketing period fixed by the board for any commodity, the board may enter into marketing agreements for the purchase, withholding, and disposal of the food products of such commodity, and all provisions of this section applicable to marketing agreements for the purchase, withholding, and disposal of a surplus of the commodity, shall apply to the agreements in respect of its food products.

It is plain that that provision was to take care of the packers and the millers, and not of the farmers, and all at the expense of the farmers through the equalization fee.

Since I told Mr. Peek that the Vice President was not satisfactory to me as a presidential candidate because of his connection with this Federal reserve banking crowd, and also because of the system of gag rules that he wanted to put on the Senate, and stifle even the voice of the farmer, because of those things, Mr. Peek has been exceedingly cool to me since that interview. Before that he consulted me a great many times upon these farm problems, but since then he has bombarded me with telegrams, he has had the members of the farmers' committee wire me and threaten me with political punishment and everything else unless I got in line for the Dawes bill. This is not the McNary-Haugen bill, this is the Dawes bill. I am not quite in line yet, you see.

Now, I want to go back. The Dawes plan of managing the finances of this country by the deflation of the country began on the 18th of May, 1920, officially. That was when the Federal Reserve Board met to consider the question of deflation in this country. I maintain that it is an economic crime for a reserve board ever to consider a deflation policy. Loans are made by the board and approved by it, and it is not right that the industries established because of that approval should be torn down by having their loans called. Yet this board met on May 18, 1920, for that purpose. Of course, all the members of the board who were in that meeting were Democrats. Remember that on the other side of the Chamber. Every one of them was a Democrat.

Mr. HEFLIN rose.

Mr. BROOKHART. But the class A directors and the advisory council were there, too, and, of course, I will admit to the Senator that a majority of those were Republicans. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HEFLIN. Who were the Democrats the Senator speaks of?

Mr. BROOKHART. I remember one, W. P. G. Harding.

Mr. HEFLIN. He was not a Democrat. He quit the Democratic Party and supported Harding in that campaign.

Mr. BROOKHART. These high-class Democrats very frequently get over into the Republican Party.

Mr. HEFLIN. Whenever they reach the point where they can not carry on in the Democratic Party as they want to, they go into the Republican Party.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; that is very true; I will not dispute that with the Senator. We will see what happened as a result of that meeting. The meeting was held at about the same time that Mr. Hoover quit oppressing the farmers of the United States.

As I said, I am not for Hoover and I am not for DAWES, and I do not know that I shall support either one of them in the election if he is nominated. They have to offer me something better than the McNary-Haugen bill or I will not do so. I am going to see that the platform of the Republican Party is carried out. I am going to stand on that platform in the next election, so far as I am concerned, that one which said that we would give equality to agriculture compared with the other industries of the country.

Now we come to the point. I have here the account of Mr. Hoover's winding up his war activities and ending the wheat corporation. That occurred the latter part of May, 1920.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Was that before or after Mr. Hoover decided whether he was a Democrat or a Republican?

Mr. BROOKHART. He was still acting as a Democrat. I will have to give the Democrats credit for this part of his activities.

Mr. BARKLEY. It was soon after that, however, that he decided to be a Republican?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; I guess so.

I have the quotations of farm prices as Mr. Hoover turned them over to the country. I got them out of the Chicago Tribune, which is mighty good authority. I sent over to the legislative reference bureau and they figured it out for me.

On May 29, 1920, I find that hogs, heavy butchers, were worth $14.35 to $14.70. That is the price Mr. Hoover turned over to us when he quit managing prices in the United States. I am willing to concede that was too low compared to other prices. I know that Mr. Hoover did depress farm prices below the level of other prices to some extent. But after the Vice President's crowd, the bankers' crowd, got control of the thing and put on the deflation, here is what happened: In January, 1921, the same hogs had fallen from $14.35 to $9.40.

Then I find in reference to cattle, good to choice steers, that they were worth $12 to $13.75 when Mr. Hoover turned them over, and after the Vice President and his crowd had operated on them for about a year they were $7.25 to $9.25 per hundred for the same grades.

I find with reference to corn that when Mr. Hoover turned the prices over to the country and quit deflating them, in May, 1920, No. 2 mixed was $1.89 to $1.90, but in January, 1921, the same corn was down to 62.5 to 63 cents after the Federal reserve system and the crowd represented by the Vice President had operated those things for about a year.

I find that No. 2 hard wheat, when Mr. Hoover turned it over, was worth $2.85 to $2.87, but in January, 1921, the same wheat, after our Federal reserve system, in which the Vice President is so greatly interested, had done its work, had been reduced to $1.70¾. Cotton, when Mr. Hoover turned it over while he was still a Democrat, was worth 40 cents a pound. In February, 1921, that same cotton was down to 11.8 cents per pound.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I take it from that that when Mr. Hoover ceased to be a Democrat and went over into the Republican Party he nearly ruined that party.

Mr. BROOKHART. It looks awfully bad for the Republicans, does it not? The trouble with the Senator's argument is that it is good if it is a Democrat, but it is bad if it is a Republican. I do not make my argument on that basis. I think the Senator will have to admit that I hit the Republicans just the same as the Democrats when they are just as guilty as the Democrats which, of course, is not very often. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. In this instance, more so.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, why was all of this injected into the RECORD at this time? Why was presidential politics mixed up with the solution of the farm problem? It is because nothing is wanted to be done at this session of the Congress. The main sponsor of the farm bill, Mr. George N. Peek himself, does not want a bill passed that will be signed by the President of the United States. He wants a bill that will be vetoed so he can keep the issue alive. Then he will point to his candidate and say that he stood for the relief of the farmer. Of course, that bill not being in operation, nobody can prove its inefficiency except by argument.

The whole situation has been worked in that way. I called on the chairman of the committee, the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], before this session of Congress began, to get ready for the consideration of the farm relief bill. I found the Senator from Oregon eager and ready to proceed, and to enact the bill into law. Why was it not enacted in December, even before the holidays? When it was finally reported it was reported without a word of amendment. The only reason why the bill was not reported was because Mr. Peek and his crowd, pretending to represent the farmers, were not here. They were waiting. What were they waiting for? For political purposes they wanted nothing done until toward the end of the session. Nothing was done at that time.

Finally, when the hearings came on, I was the only man that appeared before the committee in any way. The Senator from Oregon gave every consideration to the evidence I presented. I brought the best witness in the United States, the one who had prepared the cost-of-production theory for the farmers, and which had been approved by the farmers by unanimous vote, as I have already said, in that Corn Belt conference.

I fear that one trouble with our Democratic friends is that they are a little like Mr. Peek in that they want some political capital out of the situation. In the first discussion with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] upon the proposition I called upon the other side of the Chamber to come forward with a program and said I would support it. But it is not here. Here is the farmer, entitled to relief by law, entitled to this consideration, but he is getting nothing. He is the football of the situation. The bill will be vetoed, of course, and there are not enough votes to pass it over the veto. It will be used by one set of candidates, trying to get into office, and the other, trying to stay in office, and neither of them really intending to do anything for the farmers.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. KING. I thank the Senator. I ask for information because I have not been able to be in the Chamber, owing to committee work, to listen to the discussion. May I ask the Senator what percentage of the farm organizations, if he knows, favor the so-called McNary-Haugen bill and what proportion of the membership of other agricultural organizations favor the measure which the Senator from Iowa advocates or some other measure which deals with the agricultural situation?

Mr. BROOKHART. I can give the Senator some information from personal knowledge. I have talked to twice as many farmers in the State of Iowa as all the farm leaders. I have given eight years of my life to a study of this question. I have presented the proposition in every speech I have made to the farmers of my State exactly as I have presented it in this bill, except as to some minor details. I was elected by the farmers, as I have already said, in spite of the opposition of the newspapers. I was elected by the farmers without respect to party. Democratic farmers voted for me everywhere. In spite of the opposition of the newspapers, in spite of the opposition of the chambers of commerce, in spite of the bankers' association, and in spite of what I call the whole Dawes crowd out in the State of Iowa I was elected, and I know they stand for a bill substantially as I have presented it here. Some of those newspapers are firing at me now and some leaders are sending telegrams to me that they mean to hold me responsible for this situation. I am responsible for what I have said and for what I have done, and I do not care what the situation may be or who these parties nominate, I am going to continue this fight for agriculture upon its merits.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STEIWER in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the Senator whether, before the committee which considered the bill known as the McNary-Haugen bill and reported it to the Senate, there were any persons appeared other than the Senator from Iowa? Did Mr. Peek and his organization appear?

Mr. BROOKHART. No; Mr. Peek and his organization prepared this bill and sent it over. There was no hearing. No one appeared except myself. Am I not correct, may I ask the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. McNARY. No. I do not want anyone to conclude——

Mr. BROOKHART. I am not blaming the Senator from Oregon. He was willing all the time to do everything that could be done in the matter. I have no blame to put on him. He has been fair all the way through. I yield now to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. I only want to say in connection with the hearings that the Senator from Iowa came before the committee and gave a very full and able description of his bill and its main purposes. The committee considered the whole proposition and decided it did not want to have any further hearings. No one else was called before the committee. The Senator's bill was considered; indeed, all the bills were considered and they were seven in number. This bill, to which I devoted a great deal of work and much of the preparation of which was done by the drafting bureau, was voted to be reported out favorably by the committee.

I do not want any one to be charged with any delay in the consideration of the bill by the committee or its report to the Senate. I assume all responsibility. There was no time before the holidays to consider the bill. There were very few committees in session. After the holidays I was interested in the Boulder Dam project, the Columbia Basin project, and the Des Chutes project; all for the Northwest and one of which was in my own State. I took the privilege of being present before the Committee on Reclamation, which was considering those bills, because I had a perfect familiarity with them, having been a former chairman of that committee.

Following the hearings on the three measures which I have just mentioned, the matter of flood control came up and I am ranking member of the Senate Committee on Commerce having that bill in charge. I was deeply interested in flood-control legislation. I took the position from the start that the Government should assume the whole liability for the trespass of that river upon private property.

I neglected hearings on the agricultural bill until I had finished that other work. I assume all responsibility and I say here in the presence of the Members of the Senate that there was not any letter and not an individual asking me to delay its consideration one minute. If any one was to blame in that regard I accept the blame.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator is very generous, but I will not put the blame on him in spite of his assertions. I know who is to blame.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. GOODING. I am sure the Senator will agree with me, however, that so far as Mr. Peek and his friends were concerned, being here representing the Committee of Twenty-two, that they urged early consideration of the bill, even before the holidays, and as soon as they came on the ground. There is no doubt about that. I met them a great many times myself and I urged consideration of the bill as early as possible. The Senator was doing all that was humanly possible for any man to do, but was not able to report the bill sooner than it was finally reported. There has been no intentional delay on the part of the friends of the measure at all. In that respect the Senator from Iowa is entirely mistaken.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have not any doubt that Mr. Peek talked that way to the Senator, but I have not any doubt either that he is managing the bill as a campaign platform for his candidate for the Presidency, the present Vice President of the United States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator submit to another interruption?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. KING. I recall a year ago that the Grange, which is an old organization and, so far as I have been able to discover, a very intelligent and conservative organization, exhibited opposition to the former McNary-Haugen bill, which, so far as I can see, is very much like the present bill.

Mr. McNARY. That is quite an inaccurate statement. The Grange has never objected to this bill, and Mr. Tabor, who was the head of the Grange, visited me on my farm in Oregon and again this summer in my office in the Senate Office Building, and said, "I am very well satisfied with the proposition, but I believe the debenture plan is a better one. We will not push that until you first have an opportunity again to present your bill for the consideration of Congress."

Mr. KING. I accept the statement, of course, of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. BROOKHART. I had some consultations with the Grange. I think the Senator's statement is substantially correct, but they were not for this bill. They were for the debenture bill, and they wanted this bill to pass or fail first and then try to put their bill forward and see if it would not pass at this Congress after the now pending bill had passed at this session—another reason why Mr. Peek did not want the McNary-Haugen bill to pass early in the session.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator submit to a further interruption?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. KING. I do not know whether the Senator meant to criticize my statement. I stated that a year ago, as I understood, the Grange was not in favor of the McNary-Haugen bill as then before the Congress.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think it is fair to say that they are not in favor of it.

Mr. KING. I base that statement upon communications which I have received.

Mr. BROOKHART. On the other hand, out of courtesy to the other farm organizations, they did not want to turn around and say, "We are fighting it."

Mr. KING. I recall receiving some papers—published by the organization, as I was advised—which expressed opposition to it. Now, what their attitude with respect to the pending bill is I do not know, and that is the reason I asked the Senator. I sincerely hope the Senator from Oregon was not criticizing my statement of the attitude of the Grange a year ago as being inaccurate.

Mr. McNARY. Not at all; I have no reason ever to criticize the distinguished Senator from Utah. I was only explaining the present attitude, as I interpret it, of the National Grange.

Mr. KING. The Senator may be right. I was merely asking the Senator from Iowa what the present attitude of the Grange was; and I am very glad to be advised by the Senator.

One other question, if the Senator from Iowa will permit me. I recall during the last summer there were a number of meetings of farmers in Iowa. Some of those meetings were labeled "meetings of corn farmers" or of producers of corn; but my recollection is—and if I am in error I want to be corrected—that they were not particularly enthusiastic or anxious over the old McNary-Haugen bill but had some other measure. What was that measure which did meet their approval? Was it the one which the Senator from Iowa is now advocating?

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I think the rank and file of the farmers supported the original Norris bill quite strongly. A large part of my bill is copied from the Norris bill; in fact, the main features of it are copied from that measure. I think there is no doubt the farmers are demanding equal rights of the Congress as promised them by the platforms of both the great political parties of this country.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BROOKHART. I do.

Mr. WATSON. I became acquainted with George N. Peek, Chester Davis, Doctor Kilgore, Mr. Frank Murphy, and other gentlemen interested in this farm measure, something over three years ago when they were pressing the measure at that time. It may have been four years ago; I am not sure as to the date. My attention was first directed to the economic phases of this bill by the Vice President, and with him I very frequently met with different economists to discuss the economic phases of this proposition, in which I was deeply interested.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think the Senator from Indiana is right. The measure ought to be called the "Dawes bill."

Mr. WATSON. No. The bill had been introduced; the Vice President had nothing in the world to do with its formulation or its introduction. Of course, he will tell the Senator that.

That was some three or four years ago; and, of course, the Senator would not suggest that Mr. Peek and these other gentlemen were formulating a bill to be held for three or four years in order to have it constitute a platform upon which the Vice President might run for President. The Senator is too kind-hearted and too generous to do that, I know. I will say that during all this time I have been in conference with those gentlemen, off and on, during the intervening months. Mr. Peek and his associates came here immediately after the Christmas holidays; I had some correspondence with them, in which I told them that there would be no opportunity to take the bill up before the holidays. I consulted with my friend the Senator from Oregon as soon as he came here before the holiday session. There was no opportunity to take the bill up, just as he said. They came here immediately after the holidays and began to discuss the measure. All of us together attempted to influence the chairman and various members of the committee to have the bill reported. I had conferences later with Democrats and Republicans in the effort to have the bill reported. I talked about it with my friend from Oregon over and over again, and with other members of the committee who are equally interested in it.

There was no thought of individual preference for presidential nomination involved. We were just as sincerely in favor of legislation to benefit the farmer as is the Senator from Iowa or as he could be. We may have differed as to methods or as to the measure, but as to the end to be accomplished, as to the objective to be achieved, there was no difference; and it is unfair, I want to say, to Mr. Peek and these other gentlemen to say that they were doing everything they could to delay the measure, when I personally know—and I am entirely familiar with the facts—that they were here day after day pleading with us to get this bill reported from the committee, and they were impatient of the delay, too.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, what the Senator has said does not change the situation so far as this proposed legislation is concerned. I was acquainted with Mr. Peek and was closely in touch with him; I formed a very high opinion of his ability and all that; but just as quickly as he ascertained that I was not for Dawes for President, all of his sympathy with me, which had previously been complete, vanished and disappeared, and I have been the object of bombardment by him ever since that time.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BROOKHART. I do.

Mr. BLAINE. I listened with a great deal of interest to what the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] had to say with respect to certain gentlemen who I understand were presumed to represent the farmers here in the city of Washington, among them being a Mr. Peek, a Mr. Davis, and Mr. Murphy. Who are these gentlemen; what is their relationship with the farmer; where do they come from; what is their business; and who is paying their expenses?

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I can speak for Mr. Davis. He was formerly with the agricultural bureau and editor of a farm paper in Montana. He is one of the progressive Republicans in that State.

Mr. BROOKHART. He has been in the employment of Mr. Peek for quite a while.

Mr. WHEELER. But he was formerly editor of a farm paper in the State of Montana, and he has been associated with farm organizations and has followed agricultural-college work in that State. He is one of the high-class citizens of Montana, and I am sure that he has been deeply interested in this proposed legislation in every way, shape, and form for many years.

Mr. BLAINE. That is one accounted for. Who is Mr. Murphy?

Mr. BROOKHART. He is a lawyer somewhere in Minnesota. I do not know much about him. He seems to be a very nice gentleman.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I can say a word for Mr. Murphy. I do not think he needs any defense from me. He comes from my State. I have known him for 25 years. He is a large landowner in Minnesota. He operates a great deal of farm land in that State. I have seen him here from time to time during the last two or three years, as I have seen Mr. Peek. I do not know that I have seen Mr. Davis.

I will say for these gentlemen that if they have some scheme to assist some one to ride into the Presidency upon the hobby horse of an agricultural relief bill, that is something they have never discussed with me. I will say further that I have found many people since I came to Washington who have come here for the purpose of lobbying for legislation. I have seen a great many lobbyists who pretended to speak for agriculture, and I want to say that during the past 25 years, if there is anyone who has sold out to the farmer, it has been those who have come here as leaders of the farmers to speak for the farmers.

When I first was introduced to Mr. Peek I was a little suspicious of him because I thought the chances were he was the usual type of representatives of the farmer who come to Washington. After I became better acquainted with him, while he may have fooled me, at least he made me believe that he was sincere; he made me believe that he talked in a language that I understood; he seemed to understand the economics of the situation. Finally I said to Mr. Peek, after I had seen him here several times, "Mr. Peek, if you are what you seem to me to be, you need not waste any time talking to me. Go and talk to others. I do not need it." I said, "I am glad I found one man here in Washington lobbying for the farmer who at least seems to be a sincere, honest, and an able man."

I have seen or learned of nothing since to change my view of Mr. Peek. In my opinion these men have all rendered valuable service. I can not believe they will now wreck their reputation for nonpartisanship by cheap partisan politics.

I do not question the point of view of the Senator from Iowa. The gentlemen to whom he has referred may have some scheme to assist some one to ride into the White House on this bill; I do not know anything about that. So far as this bill is concerned I shall reserve my remarks to a later time.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. Peek is generally for Governor Lowden. A good deal has been said about the farmers being for Governor Lowden, but I will have to say that they are getting the delegates for DAWES. So far as the poor old governor is concerned, he has been double-crossed, criss-crossed, cross-eyed, cross-legged, and cross-fired out of the contest before it begins.

Mr. BLAINE. I should like to ask another question, if the Senator will yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. Are these three gentlemen the representatives of the farmers in the city of Washington?

Mr. BROOKHART. No; they are not. Mr. Murphy represents a bureau of farmers. I have had no experience with Mr. Murphy that would lead me to criticize him in any way, and I have had no experience with Chester Davis, except that he is closely associated with Mr. Peek and was an employee of Mr. Peek's, possibly.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAINE. I should like to ask another question.

Mr. GOODING. I should like to answer, if I may be permitted to do so, the question of the Senator from Wisconsin in regard to Mr. Peek.

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. GOODING. I will say that Mr. Peek is here representing the farm bureau——

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. GOODING. Out of the farm bureau grew the organization known as the Committee of Twenty-two.

Mr. BROOKHART. No; I was there when that organization was formed. The farm bureau had nothing to do with it. They were altogether on the outside.

Mr. GOODING. They have been a party to it all the time and they are behind this proposed legislation at the present time. I was present with that organization at a meeting which was held by the Committee on Agriculture. Mr. Peek has always taken a very active part in advocating farm relief legislation, and is here representing the organization of 22 States that has gone on record for the pending bill. He is entitled to a great deal of credit for it. He has put in much time at the sacrifice of his own business, and I am sorry the Senator has seen fit to criticize him.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. Peek represents the bankers of 11 States, with two representatives each from 11 States making up the Committee on Twenty-two. Of course, I think the Senator from Idaho is not familiar with the situation.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to another question?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. BLAINE. It may not be important who is here advocating this bill or that bill, but it seems as if the three so-called farm leaders are Mr. Peek, a banker; Mr. Davis, a farmer or editor of a farm paper, and Mr. Murphy, a lawyer. Which of these three gentlemen may get an appointment on the board at $10,000 a year, if their candidate, no matter who that candidate may be, succeeds to the Presidency?

Mr. BROOKHART. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. GOODING. Let me say to the Senator from Wisconsin that Mr. Peek is not a banker. Mr. Peek was in the agricultural-implement business, and, for all I know, is still in that business.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, after eight years of fighting on this proposition and after eight years of studying the economics of it halfway around the world, I am not willing to accept a theory advanced by somebody who is advocating a candidate for President. Why did Mr. Peek have this Hoover article inserted in the RECORD? It is the most unreasonable description of a situation that was ever put in the RECORD. Mr. Hoover's prices that I have quoted to you never deflated the farmer that $20,000,000,000. If the farmers could have maintained even the Hoover prices, which I have claimed and claim now were too low, that deflation would not have occurred. These Hoover prices never increased the farmers' debt by $12,000,000,000. These Hoover prices never increased farm bankruptcies by a thousand per cent; and after my personal experience and contact with this situation, I feel that the farmers have been betrayed by this leadership. I do not say my say behind anybody's back; I say right to his face.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, a very good analysis of the McNary-Haugen bill has been made by Hon. E. C. Lampson, of Ohio, who, I think, expresses the views of the people of Ohio on the question. I ask permission to have it printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

HOW THE M'NARY-HAUGEN BILL WOULD OPERATE IN THE COUNTY OF ASHTABULA—POLITICAL FARM-RELIEF MEASURE LIKELY TO PASS CONGRESS IN APRIL

The McNary-Haugen bill passed Congress last session. It was vetoed by our courageous President on the ground that the equalization fee is unconstitutional. The President cited other objections and stated that the bill would be a tremendous burden upon agriculture. It would not be farm relief.

I have read hundreds of pages of testimony given at Washington before the House Agricultural Committee, and have read the testimony given in favor of the National Grange debenture bill. I indorse this debenture bill as the one practical means of artificially increasing prices of all farm products subject to export that has been submitted to Congress. However, the McNary-Haugen bill probably will pass the Senate this week. It may not pass the House, but the chances are it will pass the House, and that it will be vetoed again by the President if the equalization fee is retained.

The bill opens with a declaration of policy, which in substance is to preserve domestic markets, to prevent suppression of commerce with foreign nations, to provide for orderly marketing, to control and dispose of the surplus, to minimize speculation and waste in marketing agricultural commodities. But the declaration of policy is negatived by the provisions of the bill.

The bill sets up a national agricultural board, with subboards for each agricultural product, with officers, clerks, examiners, inspectors, and a veritable host of tax gatherers. The word tax is not used. It is sugar-coated by the words "equalization fee."

The national board is authorized to enter into contracts with cooperatives and processors and loan Government funds to them to buy, store, and market the alleged surplus products, and later to dispose of such products. While a profit is possible, the consensus of opinion is that such surpluses will have to be sold at the world price and hence below the artificial domestic price. The Government is to pay this loss at first.

There is the first denial of the declaration of policy against waste. The bill provides machinery for creating an enormous waste of public funds.

It is the idea of the proponents that the establishing of such Government-aided cooperatives will place in the market an agency to force the price of commodities upward. Any other idea would defeat the primary purpose of the bill—namely, to maintain a price above the average cost of production, to raise the price. This is called stabilization.

Buying and storing commodities are instruments of speculation. Such acts are the normal methods of speculation through certificates that can be redeemed in the actual commodity. Hence the bill provides that the Government is to take a hand in speculation; the declaration of policy is thus made negative. Speculation is to be enhanced with Government funds. All of the people are to be taxed for the benefit of a few people.

But will there be benefit to even a few people?

Will this bill benefit any class of agriculture to a notable degree?

I do not think so.

Why not?

Because the evidence of the proponents of the bill demanded an equalization fee to raise a fund from all producers great enough to pay the enormous losses contemplated—to take care of the frightful waste in buying, storing, and dumping the surplus, bought at domestic figures and sold at world prices. That process absolutely demands the fee to provide the necessary funds to be wasted.

WHO WILL PAY THIS FEE?

Every farmer, whether he is a beneficiary or not of the scheme for raising the one-crop farmer at the expense of the general farmers of the Nation. Every generation, we get some panacea for making wealth from the hot air, that blows across the western prairies—the source of populism, State-ownership scandals, and broken bank guarantee laws.

Who pays this equalization fee, this excise tax, this crushing tax on all farmers?

The farmer first, and the general public last in added costs of living.

The direct tax comes upon the farmer first, whether he is benefited or not.

This is a compulsory cooperation bill with an organization over which the vast majority of individual farmers will never have a voice in management, policy, or affairs. It is a soviet form of agricultural dictatorship.

How will this tax be collected?

The proponents say by adding it to freight rates, or to sales to processors, or to the ultimate consumer.

The farmer is the ultimate consumer of 85 per cent of corn and 40 per cent of wheat.

In Ashtabula County, according to 1925 report of the National Department of Agriculture, there were 18,153 persons living on farms, a little less than one-third of the county population, which is the national average.

Of this number 15,600 lived on their own farms. There were 2,460 tenants. And there were 4,588 farms reported in this county alone, of which 3,782 are dairy farms. Of this number, 3,329 raised corn, 1,143 raised wheat, and yet our county farmers do not raise enough corn and wheat to supply their own needs. They buy wheat and they buy corn. They produce milk, as the main source of income, and they feed corn and wheat to make milk. Higher prices for feed can seldom be recovered in higher milk prices. This bill penalizes our farmer, even if it would increase the price of our grains. But that is not the greatest objection to the bill.

Let us apply it to potatoes raised on 2,828 farms in Ashtabula County for market above home needs.

Suppose the national board attempted to stabilize potatoes, which have fluctuated from 20 cents a bushel to $5 in the past 20 years.

At what price would the potatoes be stabilized? No one knows. You can bet your last dollar it would not be at a high price, since nearly 100 per cent of the consuming public need potatoes and are not interested in high prices. The pressure would be for cheap potatoes.

But suppose the price were stabilized at $1 per bushel as the average cost of production. (Who can say what that is?) Here is how the law would work in Ashtabula County for potatoes:

Every time a farmer drove to town to sell a bag of potatoes he would have to hunt up the local representative of the national board and pay him an equalization fee, which is nothing less than a tax on the farmer's right to do business. If he evaded this tax, he could be fined and imprisoned. Now apply this same tax burden to everything the farmer produces. Would it cripple rural trade transactions? Will the farmer love the tax gatherer? Can you see what the McNary-Haugen bill would do to every independent farmer in the Nation? Imagine millions, perhaps billions, of transactions to be recorded, fees collected, and the paper work reported, and then imagine the veritable swarm of tax scavengers devastating the land!

Soviet Russia is facing famine for trying to dictate to its farmers. What American farmer will produce more than he needs if he has to get a Government stamp for every purchase and sale he desires to make?

Our Revolutionary forefathers refused to pay the stamp tax of King George. Are the political dogmatists of 1928 blindly forcing the vast army of independent American farmers into a modern stamp-tax revolt? It is time Congress gave serious consideration to this very great possibility.

E. C. LAMPSON.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I send to the clerk's desk an amendment which I shall offer at the proper time to the pending farm relief bill, and ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That order will be made.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I always listen with a great deal of interest to the able Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART]. I listened to him with interest on yesterday when he was telling the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] that this Republican "prosperity" that we see so much about in the newspapers does not really exist amongst the masses of the people.

That is true of the South. The farmers of the South have never yet recovered from the Republican deflation panic of 1920 and 1921. Farm values in the South, as in the West, were destroyed to the extent of billions of dollars. Mortgage foreclosures, farmers losing their farms, and bank failures are the fruits of the Republican administration.

I am not satisfied with the proposed farm relief bill now before the Senate. It has some good features in it; but I can not see that Congress has the right to impose an equalization fee upon the cotton farmers of the country who are not members of a cooperative association and take money from them to put into a fund controlled by those cooperatives of which they are not members. If they want to become members of a farm organization—and I think they should—all well and good. But if they do not want to join a farm organization, that is their business. They ought not to be compelled by Congress to join any organization unless they want to; and unless they do join, Mr. President, they ought not to have to pay the equalization fee on their cotton unless they consent to do so. That is good, sound American doctrine. The cotton farmer is a sovereign citizen, and we have no right to impose this equalization fee or tax upon his cotton unless he is consulted and gives his consent to have it done. Senators, those of you who vote for that proposition as it stands are going to get yourselves in trouble.

The Senator from Iowa has told us of the numerous changing attitudes of Mr. Hoover, the Secretary of Commerce. Mr. Hoover seems to have a lot of sins to account for. He has taken a step right recently forcing whites and negroes to work side by side in the Commerce Department that will be repudiated by nearly every white man and woman in the country. Many intelligent negroes will realize that he is playing politics and has made a serious mistake.

What right has he to disturb the splendid segregation arrangement established in the Commerce Department by the Democratic Party, under which the negroes were working and getting along well in one section and the whites were working in another and pleased with the situation? They tell us that the high-brow negro organization for the advancement of the colored race called on Mr. Hoover and demanded that he do just what he has done in his "social equality" move in the Commerce Department. So Mr. Hoover comes now, in his effort to get delegates to a Republican National Convention, and is putting negro men and women in the offices to work alongside white women and girls. He has broken up the segregation plan that we had, and now he is distributing negroes all through the department promiscuously by placing them alongside of whites.

Will the white Republicans of the country tamely submit to this dangerous political play and humiliating action on the part of Mr. Hoover?

Mr. President, practically the whole white force in the Commerce Department is revolting, entering protests as far as the individuals dare to enter protest against this unpleasant, irritating, and offensive action on the part of Mr. Hoover. The letter read here to-day by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE] tells the story of humiliated white girls in the department coming here from the various States of this Union and being obliged to sit alongside buck negroes working in the department. Such a thing is a shocking outrage upon these fine American girls and a shame on any administration.

We do not have mixed schools in Washington. We have negro schools and negro teachers, negro churches and negro preachers, which is sound and right; and that is the best way to handle this question. We of the South know from long experience how best to handle it. You can not handle it without friction, prejudice, bitterness, and hate by forcing these races together in a contact that is unpleasant and disagreeable to the white race.

Mr. Lincoln, in his great debate with Douglas in 1859 at Charleston, Ill., said that as long as the two races are together he favored the white race occupying the superior place. He was opposed to social equality and of marriage of whites with blacks. Mr. President, Lincoln was sound on that. The Southern States have put it in their constitutions that these things can not be. It ought to be so in the District of Columbia. Of course, it is very rarely that you would find this taking place; but I recall an instance when I was in the House some years ago where some poor, degenerate white fellow here in Washington married a negro woman, and Senator Hardwick, of Georgia, then a Member of the House, introduced a bill to prevent marriage between the races here, and certain Republicans in the House fought that bill. Mr. MADDEN was one of them.

Senators, Mr. Hoover can not play with this question in this fashion. I believe in treating the negro right; I believe in giving him a fair deal; and you give him a fair deal when you let him work where he can work in comfort and in ease. He is not going to be comfortable, he is not going to be at ease, when you force him into these rooms to work alongside white women and white men where that situation breeds unpleasantness and bitterness. It is not right. It is not best for either race. It is against the best interest of both races. God Almighty has made racial facts.

And you have no business, Mr. Hoover, to undertake to interfere with the handiwork of the Almighty. He had as much purpose in making four separate and distinct races as he did in making four separate and distinct money metals—copper and pewter and silver and gold. There is a climax in races as there is in everything else.

Just as the eagle is the king of all fowls, just as the lion is the king of all beasts, and just as the whale is the king of all the fishes of the seas, the white race is the superior race, the king race, the climax and crowning glory of the four races of black, yellow, red, and white. The South's doctrine of white supremacy is right and it is fast becoming the doctrine of the American Republic. Mr. Hoover will find out that the self-respecting white men and women of this Nation are not going to indorse this eleventh-hour political move of his, this miserable and shameful move to get negro votes, delegates to the Republican National Convention at Kansas City. And he is going to find out that while he is reaching out for the negro vote he is going to lose tremendously in the white Republican vote. The white people of the North—I mean the rank and file—do not believe any more in social equality than we do, and if he thinks they do he will find that he is mistaken. He is reckoning without his host. He is not going to be able to gather into his bosom the white Republican delegates, men and women of the North, and at the same time hug up with them these negroes that he is playing for, these "chocolate drops" that he is now handing out to the Negro race over the country.

Mr. President, in the name of the white men and women of my section of the country who work in that department and of the eastern section and of the northern section and of the western section of my country I voice their protest and express their indignation on this floor. If possible some steps ought to be taken to prevent this thing; and I want to say now as one United States Senator that if Mr. Hoover discharges any of these self-respecting white women of that department for making protest to Senators about this miserable condition into which he has thrust them I want them to give me their names and come and tell me their story and I will tell it to the American people in the Senate day by day.

AFFAIRS IN NICARAGUA

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I have here an editorial from the Helena Daily Independent of April 5, 1928, entitled "Call in the Nicaraguan Army."

In this editorial it is suggested that as long as we have our marines down in Nicaragua, it might be well for the people of Chicago to call upon the little Republic of Nicaragua to send up her troops to supervise the election in that city. I ask to have the editorial inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is here printed, as follows:

CALL IN THE NICARAGUAN ARMY

The gangsters under command of the notorious "Scar Face" Al Capone took the first skirmish in the war between the bandits and the people who are to go to the polls Tuesday in Chicago to vote in the first primary election scheduled for this year. Out in the suburban municipality of Cicero, day before yesterday, gunmen armed with blackjacks, which they used freely on Democratic workers, elected a person named Klenka as mayor, running on the Republican ticket. The Federal agents have been called in to clear the atmosphere and assure the citizens of Chicago a chance to vote without intimidation. Experience the voters in Cicero encountered Tuesday doesn't encourage the Chicagoans to believe they will have much protection next week.

The suggestion made by a bystander, who, of course, doesn't live in Chicago, that the Government might profitably call in the Nicaraguan Army to supervise the election is a good one. It would be a graceful act of reciprocity and while our marines are handling the coming election for the Nicaraguans the troops of the little Republic could protect Chicago citizens against the Capone insurrectos.

General Moncado had a large number of men under arms at the time Mr. Stimson, of Washington, D. C., went down to Nicaragua and arranged to have our marines supervise the election and doubtless Moncado would be willing to do us a good turn by sending his troops here, if it isn't too late, to do a like service for our Government. At any rate he could stay here until Chicago has developed some limited capacity for self-government. As affairs stand now, we are paying for our marines to handle the Nicaraguan election. Why should we also be forced to bear the expense of deputy marshals, special officers, or dry agents to supervise the Chicago election next Tuesday? Nicaragua should take the expense off our hands.

There should be an understanding that Nicaragua is not to keep her army of occupation in Chicago after that city has reached a point to exercise independence. It is reasonable to expect that the city will be fit for self-government, say, in about 50 or 60 years. The percentage of literacy is higher here than in Nicaragua, and great numbers of Chicagoans can read and write. Probably by the time both Nicaragua and Chicago are ripe for self-government we could give the order to withdraw our marines from the little Republic at the same time an order comes from Nicaragua for her troops to come home. Both Governments would then be on an equal footing and the exchange of international courtesies would excite the admiration of the world.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, April 10, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God, our Heavenly Father, Thou art always stooping and writing on the ground, even when we see Thee not. Have mercy according to Thy great mercy. Thou dost forgive our pride, our false ambitions, and even our secret faults. We thank Thee that Thou dost bless us with the mercy of forgiveness. Do Thou banish our doubts, sanctify our sufferings, lighten our darkness, conquer our fears, and immortalize our hopes. Lead us to put supreme faith in all Christian institutions, and never allow the clock of progress to be turned back. Great problems are asking for solution. May our badge indicate always that we shall not permit the foundations of righteousness and justice to be vitiated. Holy Spirit, teach us our duty to God and man, and speak over the troubled world the holy words of peace and pardon. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

STATUE OF ANDREW JACKSON

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following concurrent resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 29

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the statue of Andrew Jackson, by Mrs. Belle Kinney Scholz, presented by the State of Tennessee, to be placed in Statuary Hall, is accepted in the name of the United States, and that the thanks of Congress be tendered the State for the contribution of the statue of one of its most eminent citizens, illustrious for his distinguished services to the country in war and in peace.

Second. That a copy of these resolutions, suitably engrossed and duly authenticated, be transmitted to the Governor of Tennessee.

Mr. SNELL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if that is the usual resolution passed in such cases?

Mr. BYRNS. I will say that in some instances no resolution is passed, but in most instances resolutions are passed, and this is in the usual form.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

BOUNDARIES OF THE CRATER NATIONAL FOREST

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 3225, an act to enlarge the boundaries of the Crater National Forest.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, for the time being I shall have to object.

Mr. HAWLEY. It will only take a few minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. It is not the time it takes now, but what it will take afterwards. I think until we have time to study that bill I will object.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday next after the disposal of business on the Speaker's table I may be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that on Thursday next after the disposition of business on the Speaker's table he may be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. On what subject?

Mr. TREADWAY. Tax revision.

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. MURPHY, from the Committee on Appropriations, by direction of that committee, reported the bill (H. R. 12875) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Union Calendar and ordered printed.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado reserved all points of order.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 12875), the legislative appropriation bill, to-day for the accommodation of the House. We will not start to read the bill to-day, but let general debate run along until such time as the House decides that it will close general debate, and then we will begin reading the bill. In the meantime I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be equally divided and controlled by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDLIN] and myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HAWLEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12875) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, there is going to be liberal debate, both general debate and under the five-minute rule?

Mr. MURPHY. I assure the gentleman that it is not the desire of the committee to limit debate.

Mr. BLANTON. This is the last one of the supply bills, and when we finish this we finish our work in the House as far as the supply bills are concerned. The gentleman ought to see to it that we get plenty of time for debate.

Mr. MURPHY. I can assure the gentleman that he will have no cause for complaint.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this bill is the last of the regular supply bills to be reported out at this session of Congress. There is a deficiency bill to follow, but this is the last of the regular appropriation bills for the fiscal year 1929. One of the great problems of this Government since the World War has been the proper balancing of the Budget, getting outlays reduced as far as possible from war-time expenditures to the proper expenditures of peace time, and the success which has attended our efforts in that direction through the operation of the new Federal Budget system and the cooperation of the legislative and executive branches of the Government in support of the Budget system has made possible the continued reduction of Federal taxes. If the bills reported by the Committee on Appropriations and passed by the Congress had not been in harmony with the economy program of the administration, if there had not been harmony of action between the President and the Congress, the Ways and Means Committee would not have had much to do in preparing bills to reduce taxes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Is not the larger credit due to the legislative branch of the Government?

Mr. CRAMTON. I would not say that.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Why can not the gentleman say that?

Mr. CRAMTON. I would say to the contrary.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Why, when the Congress has appropriated less money during the last five years than the Executive requested to run the Government?

Mr. CRAMTON. The executive branch has done wonderful work in paring the Budget below the demands that many make upon it, and we have supported the Executive so thoroughly that we have been able, ourselves, to pare somewhat below their figures.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. The gentleman says that the Executive did wonderful work in paring the Budget, and that the legislative branch did greater work in paring the estimates they sent to us.

Mr. CRAMTON. It is not necessary at all to lessen the credit due to the executive branch in order to have due credit for Congress. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] will recall that in the 30 years prior to the adoption of the Federal Budget system, during the period when each bureau made up its estimates and they were assembled in each department and each department transmitted them to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury, during the period when there was no revision of those estimates by any authority until they came to Congress, Congress found it necessary to reduce those estimates $30,000,000,000 in some 30 years below the requests of the departments. Since we have had the Budget system, since the President has an agency at hand to study those requests and to study the relationship between the total of those requests and the total of our estimated revenues, the sum total that comes to Congress is not an undigested mass, as it was before, but is a considered total which Congress then proceeds to consider, item by item, and we have been successful in reducing them.

Mr. GARNER of Texas rose.

Mr. CRAMTON. Just a moment. Let me say this to the gentleman from Texas. I did not intend to make a speech on the Budget. As a matter of fact, I have a good hour's speech on that subject, but I do not want to go into it now too heavily. Just so long as Congress continues to support the leadership of the administration in the effort for reduction of Federal expenditures, just so long will the Budget system be successful and our expenditures will stay down; but when the time comes that Congress throws aside the wish for reduction of Federal expenditures and abandons support of the Budget, then the expenditures will go up and the Ways and Means Committee might just as well take a vacation so far as the reduction of taxes is concerned.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Our annual expenses for this Government are just what the Congress appropriates. They go up when the Congress appropriates more money and they come down when the Congress refuses to appropriate the money. So it is the Congress, after all, that controls the expenditures.

Mr. CRAMTON. The Congress holds the purse strings and is entitled to credit, of course; and I say this, further, that the creation of the Budget system should be credited to Congress.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. CRAMTON. It was not inspired by Executive leadership. The President to whom the first Budget bill was presented vetoed that bill. It was passed in the next administration with the approval of the President, although not because of his insistence upon it. The Budget system resulted from the desire of Congress to have such an agency, resulted from a congressional investigation, and Congress is peculiarly entitled to credit for the creation of the Budget system.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. OLDFIELD. The gentleman says that the President to whom the bill was first presented vetoed it, and then when it was passed by the next Congress President Harding signed it, but the objectionable feature which caused the previous veto was left out of the bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am not making a partisan speech. I have stated this, that the Budget was the act of Congress and was not because of Executive insistence, and to emphasize that I say that it was vetoed by President Wilson for whatever reasons he set forth. The RECORD will show that. It was then passed in the next Congress, not because of insistence on the part of the next President, but because Congress desired it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. When President Wilson vetoed the Budget bill, it was not because he did not believe in the Budget system. It was because he did not think it was proper in that it tied the hands of certain officials, and he suggested certain amendments.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will leave it to these gentlemen to protect the motives of President Wilson in vetoing the bill. The fact is that he did veto it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. He gave good reasons for doing so.

Mr. CRAMTON. We passed it because we wanted to establish the Budget system, and we have supported it loyally.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. The gentleman will remember that that bill was vetoed by the President on constitutional grounds, and in that same Congress the special Budget Committee of which I had the honor of being a member reported a bill eliminating the objectionable features to which the President referred, and the bill passed.

Mr. CRAMTON. I do not desire to get into a controversy over that. I will let stand the statement that I have already made. The point I want to make this morning is that the Budget system, through the cooperation of the legislative and executive branches, has been a great success.

But it seems to me we have about gotten to the turning point. There is a restlessness on the part of Congress; there is a disposition on the part of Members of the Congress to press for specific appropriations in which their sections are interested; and there is some tendency and some evidence of a disposition on the part of those from one section who are interested in one project to join with those in another section, and in another and another, and get together possibly more magnificent pork barrels than the country ever dreamed of before. And if that tendency becomes an actuality, then I will say it will become definite that only the veto of the Executive can protect the economy program in which the Executive and Congress have heretofore cooperated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will have to ask 10 minutes additional, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. CRAMTON. I want to call that emphatically to the attention of the House. It seems to me there has been an effort on foot here, and there is definite evidence of an effort, to form a most magnificent and glorified pork barrel. A pork barrel bill is, as I understand it, a bill which may have items that are more or less desirable, or all of them may be, but it is an aggregation of items in which many Members of the House are interested, and it depends upon the unification of those interests to secure its passage; Members from one State and another, 20 or 30 States, or all of them together, to secure the passage of a bill. There has never been such a tremendous scheme of consolidation of big projects as is now proposed; not to be passed in one bill, it is true, but to be passed through the unification of effort under the same principle.

We hear a good deal in this Congress about farm relief legislation, and the apparent prospect is that no effective program for farm relief, so far as the country at large is concerned, will come into being. But there are before Congress bills that are of great interest to agriculture, such as the bill that proposes a certain form of farm relief to a certain limited and favored group. A bill has been reported and is on the House Calendar to loan 80 per cent of the value of irrigated land on reclamation projects to the settlers on those lands, and to use the reclamation fund to permit those settlers to develop those lands. I predict that when this House comes to understand what that bill means, that it means to give an extent of financial aid to those who expect to farm that irrigated area that the Congress refuses to give to those who farm other areas, that bill will not get far.

There is another bill of great interest to agriculture, and——

Mr. ARENTZ. Does the gentleman mean to say there is no limit to that bill that he speaks of?

Mr. CRAMTON. I said 80 per cent.

Mr. ARENTZ. Oh, no; not 80 per cent. There is a definite statement as to the number of hundreds of thousands of dollars. Eighty per cent is not a correct statement, I will say to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAMTON. It is a pretty generous relief that is to be given to those engaged in that particular class of farming.

Then there is what is known as the Columbia Basin reclamation project. I have here a copy of a letterhead of a prominent hotel in Seattle, and it carries the same propaganda on the back of it as is carried by many business concerns in the State of Washington. The Columbia Basin reclamation area which it is proposed to improve and reclaim by a bill favorably reported in this House, and which it is proposed to pass at this session, comprises 2,942 square miles. Arguments for it are boiled down in this propaganda that business houses carry to the country. It is here stated that this project, which has been favorably passed upon by a committee of the House, will add 1,883,000 acres to the cultivated farming area of America. They say it will add more than $600,000,000 to the taxable wealth of the Nation. It is figured and pointed out by my correspondent, an irrigated landowner in the State of Washington, that if it will add $600,000,000 to the Nation's taxable wealth, that means a tax valuation of $300 an acre, or $23,100 per farm, that the settler in this Columbia Basin will undergo when he goes on the land. It is stated that it will annually add $180,000,000 to the consumption of manufactured goods, and my correspondent says that that means $7,347 for each family; goods that these settlers are going to buy from the East. Then they say it will yield $200,000,000 of farm products; that is, $106 an acre, or $8,162 per family, as the farmer figures it; that it will support 24,500 families on irrigated land. Promises that glitter and lure, but do not stand up under analysis.

I have two letters here from the State of Washington from those who are experienced in irrigated lands in the State of Washington. They remind me of what is now the fact that land now irrigated on Federal projects in the State of Washington are not making full payments of their construction and operation costs, notwithstanding their costs are not nearly what they will be on this proposed new Columbia Basin project.

I am not going into details, but I may ask consent to put in something from these letters in connection with my remarks. First is this one "from Old Timer":

SEATTLE, WASH., March 29, 1928.

Representative CRAMTON, of Michigan,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Under date of March 19 you are quoted as being in favor of a more thorough investigation of the Columbia Basin project before being approved by Congress.

I have farmed by irrigation in the Yakima Valley for the past 12 years, and I do know a little about the actual facts pertaining thereto. I have no axe to grind, but I do not want to see a lot of people go onto the place, invest their life savings, and walk off the place broken financially in spirit and in health. That is my sole object in writing you and with you advising caution.

I have the occasion to see a new Washington hotel (Seattle) letterhead, and on the back thereof the wonderful paper profit in the proposed Columbia Basin project for the 24,500 families it will support, they say. Am inclosing the same herewith.

To use their figures, putting 24,500 families on the 1,883,000 acres will give each family 77 acres. This acreage will produce $106 crops per acre, or $8,162 per family farm, and of which amount he is going to buy annually $7,347 per farm for eastern manufactured goods. This will leave this family $815 to meet the following:

I will assume he gets the 77 acres for nothing, but it is estimated it will cost $159 per acre to put the water on the high corner of his farm, so he has a bill of $12,243 for water from Uncle Sam or Mr. Work to start with for construction alone, and if Uncle only asks him 5 per cent interest thereon he will owe Uncle $612 per year (we will forget the installments that Uncle, through Mr. Work, will ask he pay yearly, because they will not trust that settler very long. He has got to pay or move off, as his farm, without water, will go to the dogs so soon; he will not stick long). He will pay every year as long as he farms the 77 acres some $3 at least for the water he uses and keeping up the Government ditches and canals, or a total per year for the farm of $230. Now, this farmer starts to get his farm in shape, level it, build flumes, his house, barn, sheds. Now, when he gets to this point his land is taxable at $300 per acre, or $23,100, for the farm. The county treasurer will not trust this settler very long either.

Now, these Columbia Basin boosters will not guarantee him $106 per acre, and try as he will he has not been able to do it in the past 10 years on the average, by far. That I know. Now, Mr. Hervey Linley and his fellow constituents say the crops they will raise there will not compete with those raised on other irrigated lands now already developed. Confidential like, I would like to know just what they expect to raise there? That is weak and cheap talk, as they will not invent any new crops. The cold facts are, and I know that section for some thirty-odd years, there may be a lot of crops they will not be able to raise at all, and all on account of the climatic conditions. That has to be tried out first, and will be expensive to the first several crops of settlers who go on it. I will tell the gentlemen boosters—and including Senators JONES and DILL—that as sure as God makes little apples the first three lots of settlers that go onto the project with a reasonable amount of money will walk off of the 77 acres worse than broke, and take the merchants and banks thereon with them, in the first 10 years. These same 24,500 settlers can now go on already developed irrigated lands for less money, and at that they will be kept darned busy doing better than playing even. Let Congress go slow, and go easy.

Merely,

AN OLD TIMER.

Also the following:

GRANDVIEW, WASH., March 27, 1928.

Representative CRAMTON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We note in Spokane Spokesman-Review that you are opposed to passage of Columbia Basin project bill without a thorough investigation. This agrees with views of most people who are familiar with the lands of the Columbia Basin.

We are under the Yakima project with a construction charge of $52 per acre as against $158 estimated under the Columbia River Basin, and the probabilities are that the charges will amount to a great deal more; at least, that is the history of other projects. The Yakima district has always ranked first as a successful United States irrigated district; lately we have dropped to second place, yet a great deal of first-class land is being sold for taxes and water. Fifty per cent of the farmers here were unable to pay their water charges last year according to the records.

The Columbia Basin project is pork-barrel politics pure and simple. The $298,000,000 is what Spokane, Portland, Seattle, and Tacoma are after. Any settlers under the project will be so handicapped with charges that they never can pay out. You will understand that after water is put on the land in a very few years drainage must be provided to take the excess water off, otherwise the land will alkali and become worthless, and these drainage projects mean an average cost of about $25 per acre, making the land too high priced for farming.

We would suggest that if you haven't already done so, that you have a talk with Commissioner Mead, of the Reclamation Department. We understand that at one time he made a booster talk at Spokane in regard to the matter and has been sorry ever since.

Thanking you for your interest in the matter, I am,

Yours very truly,

D. W. BRACKETT.

My immediate purpose in rising now is to give you a little idea of the magnitude of this Columbia Basin project, which the boosters say "is as important as adding another State to the Union." It has been favorably reported to this House and is, I understand, also favorably reported to the Senate.

Now, how is it expected to pass that bill through Congress? Standing by itself it has no chance whatever of passing at this session of Congress, but it is alleged by its friends and by its propagandists that they have been able to work out a deal which assures its passage.

No other city is quite as much interested in this project as Spokane. The center of the organization and the activity for this great project is in Spokane. The leading newspaper of Spokane—the Spokesman-Review—might well be thought to speak for this project, and under date of March 24 I find this article in the Spokesman-Review, bearing the heading:

Cinch passage for basin bill.—Senate leaders say it is sure to win this session—in big combine.

From the article itself, marked "Special to the Spokesman-Review," under date of March 24, I read this:

That the Columbia Basin bill will pass this session before adjournment is now conceded by Senate leaders, particularly those opposed to it. The bill will not pass alone but as part of a general program, which includes the Boulder Canyon Dam bill, Mississippi flood control, farm relief, and a tariff rider on the tax reduction bill.

According to information obtainable from Senate leaders, a combination has been perfected that is in control of the Senate, and this combination has more than enough votes to put through the several bills in which its Members are interested.

This great glorified pork-barrel combination—

The leaders admit that personally they are arrayed against most, if not all, the bills included in the combination, but they are equally frank to confess their inability to block the passage of these bills.

The order in which they are to be taken up has not been decided, but Mississippi flood control probably will be given first place—

And that was an accurate prediction—

having been first reported from committee, and the Columbia Basin bill may follow immediately after the Boulder Canyon Dam, which now is expected to follow behind flood control. The Columbia Basin bill has less national support than the other bills in the program, being more confined in its scope. Thus advocates of this measure have been pressed by necessity into joining forces with Senators interested in other legislation equally important to their communities.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has again expired.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON (reading):

Indications are that the House of Representatives will hold back and wait for the Senate to pass the Columbia Basin bill, but Boulder Canyon Dam advocates in the lower branch of Congress are tired of waiting on the Senate and yesterday began a drive to bring their bill up for action. If they are successful, Representatives HILL and SUMMERS, of Washington, will ask the Rules Committee for a special rule to bring up the Columbia Basin bill in the House as soon as Boulder Canyon Dam is out of the way.

I have another statement, but the clipping does not give the date. It is a local item from the Spokesman-Review at Spokane, and it quotes a letter:

"My faith in getting the Columbia Basin authorization bill through this session of Congress is firmer every day," wrote Hervey Lindley, of Seattle, president of the Columbia Basin Irrigation League, in a letter from Washington. The letter was read at the meeting of the local Columbia Basin organization executive committee at the noon meeting at the Davenport Hotel in Spokane Thursday.

Chairman Roy R. Gill, of the executive committee, after reviewing other advices from Washington, expressed optimism that the bill will go through.

The Columbia Basin workers in Washington report that the bill will almost certainly pass the Senate and has at least a 50–50 chance in the House.

And then there is a paragraph to raise several thousand dollars in each of the cities in the State of Washington for the promotion of this bill—

At the same time that affairs at Washington look rosy, the situation in this State is clearing up as regards finances. Seattle has accepted a quota of $6,000 for 1927. This is $2,000 less than was asked, but there is a possibility that the other $2,000 may be paid. Seattle's quota for the period from June 1, 1927, to May 31, 1929, is $16,500.

Liberal financing of the campaign.

Then here is an illuminating item showing the sort of political by-products which come from movements of this kind which will be of interest, probably, to my colleague from that State:

Mr. Gill, a Republican, drew applause from the Democratic members of the Columbia Basin organization when he announced that he would support Congressman SAM B. HILL, Democrat, for reelection. Congressman HILL is the only Member of the House from this State that has fought hard and consistently for Columbia Basin legislation, Mr. Gill said. According to Mr. Lindley, Congressman HILL has done much to line up the Democratic vote in the House for the bill.

So Gill counts little on Doctor SUMMERS and the other Republicans from that section, but feels out there that they have the Democratic vote in the House corralled. Whether that includes my friend from Texas [Mr. GARNER] or not I am not advised, but they feel they have the Democratic side corralled and seem to be disappointed that the Republican side has not been corralled. Must it be left to the Republicans in the House to save the economy tax-reduction program?

But, aside from that, I have tried to emphasize to the House that here is a tremendous program, involving great expenditures. The flood control bill has come through without regard to proper financial considerations which should actuate the Government. It faces the danger of a veto at the other end of the Avenue if the House passes it in the shape the Senate did. Then comes Boulder Canyon, another tremendous expenditure. I do not know whether they are going to try to jam that through under the same combination of strength as is here suggested or whether it is the expectation to pass a bill which is in harmony with the financial program of the administration.

And then this bill: Fifty years from now will be somewhat too early to build that Columbia Basin project with $300,000,000 out of the Federal Treasury—not out of the reclamation fund, as has been heretofore the case, but out of the Treasury—and then loan it out to the settlers through the construction of that project and have again the same experience we have had on similar projects where the Government has been the absolute insurer of success. When a private irrigation district is built, the money is borrowed from banks.

A firm of engineers is employed, and that firm of engineers can not always forecast the difficulties to be encountered. They give their best judgment, and the project has to pay the bill. If, when they build the project, they find there are some difficulties encountered that were not anticipated, the project has to pay the bill. But when the Government donates its engineering services, lends the money for 40 years without interest, it has been held as an insurer in the past, and whatever difficulties the engineers encounter that were not foreseen, the Government must pay the bill and not the project.

So with this kind of history back of us we are asked to take $300,000,000 out of the Treasury and put it into this tremendous, vast expansion of our agricultural acreage, and I insist that unless there does come such a combination as is here alleged, such a combination of various great interests each of which represents some section of the country, each of which has a great popular appeal in that section of the country, without a combination of such great activities this bill can not pass, and the other bills would be held down to a common-sense basis.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRAMTON. I wanted to yield back the remainder of my time, but I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. In connection with the gentleman's speech, would the gentleman give us an idea of how much of the money that has been advanced by the Government to these reclamation projects has been repaid.

Mr. CRAMTON. I could not give that offhand. There has been, as I recall, about $145,000,000 expended, and very recently we passed a bill to wipe off the slate $28,000,000 of that expenditure, and a good deal of it on such grounds as I have indicated.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Could the gentleman give us any indication of how many of these projects have been a success from the farmer's standpoint?

Mr. CRAMTON. Many of the projects. I am willing to say that, in my judgment, most of the projects have been successful; that is to say, if these settlers had borrowed the money from private sources and had fully expected to pay it back, as they would expect to pay it back if borrowed from private sources, they would have paid it back and they would be making a splendid showing; but having borrowed it from the Government, there have been campaigns year after year to have payment postponed, and then wait. It has even been the case that bankers in communities where these projects are located have gone about among the settlers and have asked them to pay their other obligations and not pay the Government. It has even been the case that some settlers who desired to pay have been urged by their neighbors not to pay because it would be establishing a bad precedent. [Laughter.]

Mr. COLE of Iowa. My question related only to those projects financed by the Government.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am speaking entirely of those projects.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield.

Mr. LINTHICUM. May I suggest to the gentleman, if he will allow us a little more irrigation here in the East, we will show the gentleman how to raise some revenue to pay for this irrigation in the West.

Mr. CRAMTON. I may suggest to my friend from Maryland, the leader of the wet bloc of the House, that he get his bill for the destruction of the Volstead Act, join this combination and bring in Maryland and New York City, which constitute about all the votes he has, put them into the combination, and maybe the gentleman can get his bill through; but that is the only way he has any chance of getting his bill through this Congress.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to say to the gentleman——

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. LINTHICUM (continuing). We already have plenty of water. We are not looking for water; we are looking for other irrigation.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan has given you his idea of the proposed development of various projects, including the Columbia Basin project in the State of Washington.

I fully appreciate the fact that the gentleman from Michigan has a feeling of hostility toward the general policy of reclamation. The reclamation act of 1902, under which there has been Government development of arid lands in the West, was not placed upon the statute books at the instance of the Members of Congress from the East and the Middle West. It was placed there by the militant work and the unanswerable argument of patriotic men of the great West.

The policy of reclamation is a success. The only remaining great West and the only remaining surplus of agricultural land in this country are the arid lands of the Western States. The richest lands in America, lacking only the application of water to make them produce abundantly, have been kept there, no doubt, under some divine provision as a residuum awaiting the necessity for their development to constitute homes, rural life, and economic development for the States in which they are located as well as for the entire Nation.

I listened with some degree of interest to the newspaper article which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] read from the Spokesman-Review, published in Spokane, Wash. I have seen similar articles sent out from Washington and published in some other parts of the western country. It is a deliberate attempt on the part of some correspondent to discredit these great enterprises which the West is endeavoring to develop. One such letter was sent to a paper in Salt Lake City, Utah, the purpose of which obviously was to discredit the work of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of this House and to make the country believe that the body of men on that committee were engaged in a log-rolling activity. I can say absolutely that I have been closely connected with the progress of this proposed legislation for the Columbia Basin, and there is not now and there never has been any arrangement or any effort to make an arrangement by which "you help me with this and I will help you with that"; not one single intimation of that character has even been suggested.

Of course, the Senate of the United States needs no defense from me, but I know the character of statements sent out from this city to other papers with reference to the Committee on Irrigation, and I do not hesitate to say that in my judgment that article was made up of untruths from start to finish.

I have a higher regard for the Members of the Senate of the United States than to believe that they would engage in any such enterprise. I know the two Senators from my State, the Senators most interested in the Columbia Basin, and I resent the slander that is intimated in this article that either one of these men would stoop to the scheme or device that is charged.

Why should we not have a development in the West? We are a part of the United States. If it were not for the subsidies of the Government to industries of the East, the owners who are to-day capitalists would be crawling on their bellies asking for bread. The whole country pays the bill. We are not complaining. You say you must have home markets in this country for agriculture, and in order to do that you must develop the industries of the country. I subscribe to that doctrine, but I want to say to you that the same rule works both ways. Is not the best market for industries in this country the home market? What are you going to do with the manufactured products if you do not have some one to sell them to? So, we are entitled to consideration, but when we come here and ask for legislation we see the representatives of the great body of enterprises that has grown fat on the bounty of this Government through favorable legislation coming here and saying, "This is not for you; this is not your Government; you are entitled to nothing."

Why, they stand up and talk glibly of equality of opportunity, and at the same time sit up on a pedestal of economic advantage looking over the great masses of the people. We are simply saying that we should be given an opportunuity to develop as you have developed. We are not envying you your success, but we want to share in it. We can do that through development, and this Columbia Basin project is one of the greatest enterprises this Nation has ever had presented to it for development.

Notwithstanding hostile criticism by gentlemen from the Middle West, I say that we are entitled to it, and the benefits will not accrue to us only but you will receive them also.

You know it makes me sick to see a man keep the dime so close to his eye that he can not see an accumulation of dollars in front. This is a great enterprise; it would increase the markets, and social problems are involved in it as well as material problems, but we will confine it to the material phase. Why not develop the markets in this country for the industries we have as well as say to our farming class of people, "Develop industries that you may have markets"?

I want to resent again the slanderous statement in the article read by the gentleman from Michigan and say to you that I will leave it to any Member of this House if I have ever approached him with the proposition of helping me roll this thing over as logs are rolled in the back country? Have I appealed to any one of you except upon the merits of the plan, which I have a right to do, and beyond which I have no right to go, and have not done so. Neither has any other Member from the State of Washington in this House. We stand here on the merits of the bill. We are going to ask for a rule and ask the House to vote for a rule for its consideration. The time is ripe for its development.

Now, I want to tell you something about it. The gentleman from Michigan seems to think that if this bill is passed this great area including the Columbia Basin project would spring into full production to-morrow, that it would come into competition with the agricultural markets that now exist and would have a depressing effect upon them. He says 50 years from now would be soon enough to talk about this development. Certainly the gentleman can not mean that. What will be the demand for foodstuff 50 years from now, increasing as the population is at the rate of 2,000,000 people a year, counting nothing for the accelerated increase as the population grows larger—50 years from now we will have 220,000,000 people in this country. The farming land now in cultivation can not feed that many people.

This great Columbia Basin project will require years for its development. It will not require any great outlay of money from the Treasury for from three to five years at the least, probably not over $250,000. Is the financial program of the President such as not to be able to expend that paltry sum within that length of time?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Washington. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I notice on the business letterhead of the propaganda that there is broadcast the estimate that from the beginning of construction to the time of water it would take about eight years, and that, of course, as the gentleman knows, would mean a substantial expenditure in the very near future.

Mr. HILL of Washington. The question of construction will be postponed necessarily for a period of from three to five years, because there are certain preliminaries that must be gotten out of the way before construction work can begin. In the first place, we must make an agreement or compact with the States of Idaho, Montana, and Oregon as to the allocation of the waters of the Columbia River and its tributaries. There must be some preliminary surveys in determining the details of the construction of this work. The magnitude of the project is such that you can not possibly enter upon its construction for a period of some three to five years, and that is the estimate of those who are familiar with it from an engineering standpoint. I am not responsible for propaganda that goes out over this country. I know that the propaganda referred to by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] does not come from the Columbia Basin Irrigation League. I appreciate the fact that the people to whom the gentleman refers are deeply interested in this project, and that they are trying to put forth the most encouraging aspect possible with reference to it; but those of us who are close to the project and who have studied it, who are working for it and know it, are not harboring the idea that any such rapid construction can be had upon it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I think I heard the gentleman say that it would take 25 years before they can begin the work. If that is so, why could not we take 20 years in which to study it before we decide upon it?

Mr. HILL of Washington. The gentleman misunderstood me; I did not say that. I said it would take from three to five years to begin construction work, but in the meantime there is work sufficient to engage the attention of the Government and the Government officials in getting ready for that construction work. That is the statement I made.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Washington. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE. Why does the gentleman think that now is the opportune time for going ahead with enlarging the farming area, when we already have before the House, or will have shortly, for consideration bills for taking care of the surplus of our farm commodities? What is the gentleman's answer to the general proposition of "hurry up" for the Columbia Basin project?

Mr. HILL of Washington. I shall be glad to answer that. In the first place, in order that you may get our viewpoint, I shall give you some conception of the length of time it will require to develop this project.

It will take from three to five years to begin construction, to be ready to begin construction. A canal 134 miles long must be built, 34 miles of which are tunnels and about 60 miles of which are concrete-lined canals, 47 feet wide at the bottom and 95 feet wide at the surface of the water and 27½ feet deep, and that will require from 8 to 10 years to construct. Included in that, of course, will be the building of a dam, which will be a very small part, comparatively, of the construction work. There would be, we will say, 11 years before we could get the water to the nearest edge of the land. Then bringing this project in in units of, say, 400,000 acres per unit, lateral canals would have to be constructed for the delivery of water to these units, and that would require, with the construction of the canals and the settlement of the projects, at least another five years. Then that land after it is put under water and after cultivation begins will require some additional years before it comes into full production. That will be only one unit. Then, after that, will come the development of the second unit, with a similar length of time and the expenditure of money required for its development and settlement, and then the third and then the fourth units, so that it is estimated by economists familiar with the project, with the conditions of construction and the conditions of climate, that 30 years will have elapsed from the time construction is authorized before it comes into full production. In 30 years from now we will have 60,000,000 more people in this country and in 15 years from now we will have 30,000,000 more people in this country than we have at the present time. Does the gentleman not realize that the increased demand for food supplies and for clothes and for all the necessities of life will be increased proportionately with the increase in population?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Washington. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I wonder if the gentleman could give us some authority for those estimates as to the increase of population. Are they based upon estimates of Government authorities?

Mr. HILL of Washington. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Or upon an expectation of materially liberalizing our immigration laws?

Mr. HILL of Washington. I shall be very glad to give the gentleman that information.

Mr. CRAMTON. I do not want to divert the gentleman. If he will insert it in his remarks, it will be entirely agreeable.

Mr. HILL of Washington. Let me read from a statement here. The statement I read from is contained in a report from the board of review appointed by the special commission composed of Doctor Mead and Assistant Secretary Edwards.

This board of review investigated this project and made its report, and this is a part of the report from which I am reading. They say:

> The late Henry E. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, basing his estimate upon statistical information, stated that the population of the United States in 1950 would be 150,000,000. Dr. Raymond Pearl, specialist in vital statistics at Johns Hopkins University, in an article on "World overcrowding," estimates a population of about 150,000,000 in continental United States in 1950. Over the 1920 census, this is an increase of nearly 45,000,000. The Census Bureau estimates a population of 120,000,000 in 1930, about 15,000,000 over the population of 1920. To provide food for the normal increase in our population, not counting immigration, the Secretary of Agriculture estimated that it would be necessary to bring under cultivation 8,000,000 acres per year, or approximately 240,000,000 acres between now and 1950 (Yearbook of 1921).

This partly answers the gentleman's question.

Mr. CRAMTON. In view of the mention of the name of Secretary Wallace, is it not a fact that Secretary Wallace, as well as Secretary Jardine, opposes the opening up of even small irrigation projects, to say nothing of 1,800,000 acres?

Mr. HILL of Washington. I am satisfied that Secretary Jardine is opposed to it. I have no recollection as to what the attitude of Secretary Wallace was; but the weight of such opposition must be determined by the reasons therefor.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Is it not a fact that a small area would be under cultivation in a few years, whereas the Columbia River Basin would not be under cultivation for quite a number of years?

Mr. HILL of Washington. Yes; that is true.

Mr. CRAMTON. The estimate of Secretary Wallace would at least be based upon our old immigration law and not based upon the present restrictive law.

Mr. HILL of Washington. In the hearings on this bill Congressman JOHNSON of Washington, who is the chairman of the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization testified, according to my recollection, to this effect, in substance—that the increase in population annually under our present immigration laws and natural increase of population ran from one and a half to two million a year. I think there can be no question about the approximate accuracy of that statement. But those are matters which can be gotten from the Census Bureau with a greater degree of accuracy than I can give them here. We all recognize that there is at least a substantial increase in the population of this country annually of 2,000,000 persons, and as the population increases the natural increase will progressively become greater each year. There is no question about that.

In further answer to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARKE] I want to finish the reading of the statement that I had before me a little while ago. The Census Bureau estimates the population of 120,000,000 in 1930. I think we can very accurately verify that statement, we are so close now to 1930. To provide for the normal increase of our population, not counting immigration, the Secretary of Agriculture estimated that it would be necessary to bring under cultivation 8,000,000 acres per year or approximately 240,000,000 acres between now and the year 1950. This was taken from the Yearbook of 1921. I will read a further statement in this connection:

> Improved land increased less than 5 per cent from 1910 to 1920, as compared with 15 to 50 per cent of previous decades, and this 5 per cent increase was practically confined to the precariously productive semiarid lands of the Great Plains region. The land in the United States suitable for agricultural uses without irrigation, drainage, or heavy fertilization is nearly all occupied. Consequently one of the great questions before the American people is, How to maintain the supply of foods and fibers for the increasing population at the high level to which we are accustomed.

Now, in further answer to the gentleman from New York on the agricultural situation, let me say this: That the student of farm economy recognizes the fact that the trouble with the farmer is not so much in the production of surpluses as in the lack of marketing facilities. If you will give to the farmers of this country the machinery by which they can put a bargaining power of 100 per cent behind the sales of their agricultural products, you will relieve the agricultural situation in this country. It is because they have not the marketing machinery, because they have nothing to say as to what they will receive for their products, but must pay the price at which the manufacturers sell their commodities to the farmer, a high price which enables them to make an excessive profit. The condition of agriculture, so far as the farmer is concerned, does not lie in the fact that profits are not made in agricultural products, but in the fact that the prices are fixed by the commercial dealer who controls the marketing agency and makes the profits. It is not a question of surplus so much as a question of marketing agencies. That is what the agricultural interests need, and that is what they ought to have.

Carrying out further the idea that I am now developing, and to justify the assertion that the time is now ripe for the adoption of this project, permit me to refer to some other statements that I have at hand. In the hearings on this bill you will find this statement:

> A study of the Department of Agriculture's figures as to land under cultivation shows that something like 340,000,000 acres of land is being cropped. The Columbia Basin project, with 1,883,000 acres, would increase this a little less than one-half of 1 per cent and add nine-tenths of 1 per cent to our productivity, which will have scarcely any effect in increasing competition with present-day farmers and will be urgently needed 20 years from now, when our population will be at least 40,000,000 more than it is to-day.

Now, the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation has recommended the passage of this bill, as did a similar committee in the other body of Congress. They had the facts before them. They knew what they were doing, and certainly they are entitled to have accorded to them some decent respect for their obligations as Members of this House. With this information before them, familiar as they are with the conditions obtaining in the great West, knowing the problems, knowing the resources, knowing the consequences of such great development, they have recommended that this bill pass.

In that report is a statement in the nature of a statement of facts, although, of course, mixed with estimates, which is as follows:

One feature of the investigation which particularly concerned the committee was the possible effect the development of this project will have upon agricultural production. It was shown that the area of the Columbia Basin project is but one-half of 1 per cent of the total lands in the United States now under cultivation and its complete development will add a little under 1 per cent to the present agricultural production.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. HILL of Washington (reading):

Estimates of the time that will be required to construct the project vary, but the minimum is placed at about 10 years for getting water to the land. Another 5 to 10 years will be required to settle the first unit of approximately 400,000 acres. Probably 30 years will elapse before the entire area could be settled. It is of importance, therefore, to note that population of the United States is increasing at the rate of 2,000,000 persons per annum. By the time the Columbia Basin project becomes a factor in food production many millions of acres in new lands will be required to produce necessary food for this additional population, and the Columbia Basin project will be able to furnish but a fraction of what is needed.

To construct the main canal by which water is to be brought to the land involves an estimated cost of $120,000,000 and the labor of seven or eight thousand men continuously for about 10 years, or an average of $12,000,000 a year. Other large expenditures will be required during the succeeding 20 years to bring the total acreage of the lands of the project into production. The first unit of the project can not be brought into production earlier than about 15 years after construction work on the main canal begins. The agricultural markets, particularly of the Northwestern States, will be stimulated rather than depressed during the period of the construction of the project because of the additional demands for farm products arising from the presence of the construction force of the magnitude required for this work. This increased demand for farm products and manufactured products as well will have no offset in competitive production from the project for a minimum period of about 15 years, and there will be no appreciable competitive production therefrom for about 30 years. At the present rate of increase of population in the United States there will be 30,000,000 more people in this country 15 years hence than we now have, and at least 60,000,000 more people at the end of 30 years.

I want to refer to a still higher authority. I am going to quote to you from a letter the President of the United States wrote to the American Mining Congress at Sacramento, Calif., in 1924. The letter, in part, is as follows:

Similar possibilities of storage of water and development of power (referring to flood control, irrigation, and reclamation) are presented to us in the Columbia River, and many projects of less dimensions but of great importance to the future of our country lie scattered over the entire intermountain region. Some minor criticism has been made as to the policy of our unremitting development of these projects by those who have thought we were already overproducing in agricultural products. They feel that these projects should be stayed until agricultural production has readjusted itself. These criticisms lie in the lack of understanding that these projects may take many years for development; that they furnish but a small portion of the total increased food supply required even by our increase in population; that the utilization of their supplies lies in the development of the West itself. It is my purpose to unremittingly stimulate and encourage the development of these great projects by every authority of the Federal Government.

I want to say to you in this connection, and without any purpose of criticism, that the greatest obstacle to progress in the development of this country and of its resources is the lack of understanding, is the lack of information, and a short-sighted economic viewpoint. Of course, the development of this great project in the West will add just that much more to the markets for the industrial production of the East. We will buy more of the gentleman's automobiles. We are buying as many as we can pay for now. If you will permit us to develop economically and increase our purchasing capacity one of the things we will buy more of than we are now buying will no doubt be automobiles. We will buy more of all manufactured products. The people now buy to the limit of their capacity, and I want to say to you that if you deny to people the right to develop and if you deny to them the right of economic advantage you are denying them the right of progress. [Applause.] What can a man do in this age of enlightenment and under our standards of civilization if he has no opportunity to get a reasonable return upon his activities? Why deny us, then, that opportunity? We have stood by the East and the Middle West, and we have helped you to put legislation through the Congress that will be of beneficial interest to you. We have stood the increased cost of manufactured products that the manufacturing industries of this country might flourish, on the theory that it is better to have home markets, even if we have to pay a little more for the goods we buy from them, than to have to come into world competition in the free-trade markets of the world.

Mr. CRAMTON. I do not want to divert the gentleman, but, if the gentleman will permit, let me say that the platform of the gentleman's party is not especially active in promoting that doctrine.

Mr. HILL of Washington. The gentleman is making this statement on his own responsibility. But I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan that the Democratic Party, with which I am affiliated, has never in the history of this country stood for free trade, never. [Applause.] There have been differences of opinion as to whether the tariff rates are not too high, but never has my party stood for free trade. Why, 40 years before the Republican Party was born the Democratic Party instituted a policy of protection. It is not the policy of any particular political party. I stand for the development of my country, all parts of it, and especially the part which I have the honor to represent.

Adverting further to the question of whether or not this proposed development is timely, if I had the time I would like to read from the report of the reviewing board, composed of such eminent men and economists, both engineers and economists, familiar with the economic and agricultural problems in this country, as are typified by Louis C. Hill, who had charge of the construction of the Salt River project, who had charge of the construction of the Laguna Dam on the Colorado River, a man of recognized authority, and about whom, and others associated with him, Commissioner Mead had this to say:

This board of review was selected to include men who were not only eminent as construction engineers but who were also familiar with the economic and agricultural aspects of reclamation.

The board of review consisted of the following eminent men, eminent as engineers and as irrigation economists: Louis C. Hill, of California; Charles H. Locher, of Maryland; Richard R. Lyman, of Utah; Arthur J. Turner, O. L. Waller, and Joseph Jacobs, of Washington.

This board, as a result of its investigation of this great Columbia Basin project, said in part as follows, in response to the question that they propounded to themselves—shall we develop our irrigable land?

In making a study of the advisability of putting so many acres of new land under cultivation, there must be kept in mind the fact that the last part of the great West has passed into history and that future tillable soil must come from irrigating our arid lands——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has again expired.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. HILL of Washington (reading):

And the future tillable soil must come from irrigating our arid lands, draining our swamps, or clearing our logged-off areas. The world's population is constantly increasing while the limit of the tillable area has been nearly reached.

In the rural districts of the United States the yearly increase of population is about 600,000.

This report was made in 1925.

These young people know farming and farming ought to be made profitable enough to induce them to remain on the farm. It will require approximately 100,000 new farms each year to satisfy such a need. The demand for agricultural lands is to be so great and available lands that offer a reasonable chance for agricultural success so scarce that rapid settlement of the more attractive areas may be definitely predicted. If the entire twenty or thirty millions of remaining irrigable acres in the United States were reclaimed the normal increase in farm population requiring annually 100,000 farms would settle such an area in half a dozen years if the settlement were thus concentrated. The reclamation, therefore, of a large acreage in the Columbia Basin will not overstock the market.

President Coolidge in his letter to the farmers' conference November 17, 1924, points out that we are already importers of foodstuffs which we ourselves should raise. Much is heard concerning the surplus of foods being responsible for the low prices received by the producer. The trouble is not that we as a nation are raising too much, but that producers of foodstuffs have no satisfactory selling organization.

I say the man who wrote this report has a real grasp of farm economics.

Existing conditions compel farmers to accept prices offered while the speculator secures the handsome difference between what the producer gets and what a consumer pays.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HILL of Washington. I yield to the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. MILLER. Can the gentleman give the House any general idea of the character of crops that would be produced on this great project?

Mr. HILL of Washington. The crops that this project will produce comprise practically all the crops that can be produced in the North Temperate Zone except cotton and perhaps tobacco and some other crops of that character. I am not sure but that we might produce tobacco.

Mr. MILLER. If the gentleman will permit a further question, it would not be exclusively a wheat-producing area, but would produce fruit and other products?

Mr. HILL of Washington. It would be diversified farming. There would be stock raising and the production of the various food crops both for man and livestock.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will yield, the cost of it, $150 to $200 an acre for the water rights, would be far above what would be feasible to use for wheat production.

Mr. HILL of Washington. I doubt myself whether it would be feasible to use all of it for wheat. It would not be used exclusively for wheat, but there would be diversified farming.

However, I want to state that on the arid lands in my State, if you will supply an abundance of water, we can stand a high cost of construction. It is not so much a question of the amount in dollars and cents that it costs to construct a project as it is that when it is constructed we have sufficient water. As we all know, water is the first and the primary essential in the successful development of an irrigation project. We have an abundance of water in this case from two distinct sources. We have the Columbia River to draw from and we have the great Pend Oreille, which is known as the Clarks Fork of the Columbia River. There is no question about the supply of water. If one source is not available the other source is available. No other project in the world has such an advantage as the Columbia Basin project so far as sources of water are concerned. You can not shut us off from a water supply, and when we get a sufficient water supply we can pay any reasonable cost of construction.

There is no question about the feasibility of this project; there is no question about the timeliness of it, and there is no question but that we are putting it up to you squarely and fairly on its merits. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has again expired.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HILL of Washington. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SINNOTT. Criticism has been made as to this land coming in too early. Now, that entire matter rests with the Secretary of the Interior, in the first place, with the Budget Bureau, in the second place, and then with the House Committee on Appropriations and the House itself as to how much money shall be appropriated each year. The Secretary of the Interior, the Budget Bureau, the House Committee on Appropriations hold the brakes on this matter. This land can not be brought into production or into cultivation improvidently or too hurriedly without the consent of Congress. We hold the brakes each year; is not that true?

Mr. HILL of Washington. That is absolutely true.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield in that connection?

Mr. HILL of Washington. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. What happens, however, is this. As soon as Congress approves the project settlers rush in there and take up the land. They are not told that it is going to be 25 years before they get water. Then, if there is a delay, we get the kind of letters I have been getting recently from settlers in the State of Oregon that they have had vain hopes for many years.

Mr. SINNOTT. No; the minute the project is authorized, any public land therein is withdrawn from entry and it is not open to entry.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. EVANS].

Mr. EVANS of California. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, the subject on which I propose to address you for a few minutes is a most depressing one and particularly so with me, because it concerns so many people well known to me, and among whom were scores of close, personal friends of many years standing. The unspeakable disaster that visited the little Santa Clara River Valley in Los Angeles and Ventura Counties on the night of the 12th of March, when the St. Francis Dam collapsed, from which more than 400 lives were snuffed out and millions of dollars of property damage resulted, is of such deep and general concern to the people of all parts of our country, I feel that it will not be out of place for me to offer the Congress a brief statement of the facts and conditions under which this appalling catastrophe occurred. Many Members of this body, out of that sort of human interest in the well-being of others, so characteristic among American people, have made inquiry as to this disaster, and my purpose is to mention only a few of the major features of this tragedy at this time.

The St. Francis Dam was located in the San Francisquito Canyon, about 45 miles northeast of the city of Los Angeles in Los Angeles County, and in the congressional district that I have the honor to represent.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of California. Yes.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. How far from Los Angeles was this dam?

Mr. EVANS of California. Some 40 miles.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. And that was a part of the water supply for the city?

Mr. EVANS of California. The water was a part of the supply of the city.

It was one of the 9 or 10 dams built by the city of Los Angeles for the storage of water along the great Los Angeles aqueduct, which leads from a point in Inyo County a distance of 234 miles to the city of Los Angeles. The building of this aqueduct was begun in 1903 and completed in 1913 at an original cost of about $24,000,000. In order to utilize the full carrying capacity of the aqueduct, which is approximately 20,000 miners' inches, it was necessary to build these storage reservoirs along its course, so that at certain seasons of the year, when all the flow was not needed, the water could be stored and held for use in drier seasons, when the draft on the supply was much larger. This dam was 650 feet long and 205 feet high from the lowest point in the canyon and had a storage capacity of 38,000 acre-feet of water. Every member of the committee doubtless knows that an acre-foot of water is simply an acre of ground covered with water 1 foot deep; or, to express it another way, the capacity of this dam was about 12,000,000,000 gallons. The dam was located far up in the canyon, at an elevation above sea level of about 1,630 feet and a distance of about 52 miles from where the Little Santa Clara River empties into the ocean at Oxnard. The first 10 or 12 miles below the dam the canyon is very narrow and precipitous. As it approaches the ocean the canyon opens out into a beautiful, sloping valley, along which there were many beautifully laid out and highly improved farms, orchards of citrous and deciduous fruits of all kinds, many splendid homes, and four or five small cities of varying sizes. The lower or west end of the valley is in Ventura County and in the congressional district represented by the Hon. A. M. FREE. From the information so far obtainable it is probable that more people lost their lives in Ventura County in this disaster than in Los Angeles County, by reason of the fact that the lower portion of the valley is more densely populated and more highly improved than the eastern or upper portion. Some confusion has resulted in the minds of a great many people who gained the impression that this dam disaster occurred in the well-known and far-famed Santa Clara Valley of central California. This confusion should be removed, and it is proper to say here that the Little Santa Clara Valley in which this dam was located is some 300 miles south of the Santa Clara Valley of central California, of which the city of San Jose is the metropolis.

The two valleys have no connection in any way except in the similarity of their names.

To draw an adequate description of this tragedy in all its aspects, with all its human sufferings, its toll of life, and other deplorable consequences, would be difficult for anyone and I must say impossible for me. At the hour of midnight, when these happy and contented people were at their homes and asleep in their beds, resting from the arduous duties of farm life and other callings, with no reason for apprehension of danger from any source and without any warning whatever of danger, this horrible and onrushing torrent of death and destruction came and swept them by the hundreds into eternity. The wholesale destruction of innocent and defenseless human beings, a great majority of whom were helpless women and little children, as in this case, is of such horrible and indescribable moment that it is impossible to contemplate.

I have said that this disaster concerns me personally, and I trust I may be forgiven if I speak for a moment in a sort of intimate fashion concerning it. I have visited this little valley dozens of times during the past few years and have been the guest in many of the homes destroyed, some of which stand out prominently in my mind as I read of their destruction. For example, I remember only a short time ago of being in the home of a well-to-do and well-known Spanish family, located just a few miles below the dam. This was a typical Spanish home of the old type, comfortable residence building surrounded by the usual large trees of umbrella, eucalyptus, and pepper species so common in that section, under the shades of which were located the barbecue pit, outdoor tables, benches, and so forth, where the members of the family spent a great deal of their time in wholesome outdoor recreation. Only a short while ago I sat under these trees with the members of this happy family, the father and the mother, sons and daughters, numbering eight in all, and upon hearing of this catastrophe I was naturally curious to know what had happened to this household. I have since read the story which recounted the destruction of every member, eight in all, together with the complete wiping out of the home and its entire surroundings. A visitor to this spot the day following the flood found no trace of this home. Later the bodies of the eight members of the family were all recovered and buried at the same time on a small elevation overlooking the ruins and desolation that only two days prior thereto marked the spot of the home and surroundings which they had enjoyed. There are others to which the same sort of particular reference could be made, and so the story goes with equal effect throughout the valley.

In disasters of this kind the first and most important thought in the minds of the people is what has been done and is being done in the way of relief of the stricken people of the section affected. First and within a few hours, as usual in all cases of great suffering of this kind, the Red Cross was on the ground and functioning. Offers of assistance came from any sections of the country, from various governmental and relief agencies, and from the President of the United States. While these offers of assistance were graciously received and deeply appreciated, the announcement was made that the local Red Cross and other relief committees on the ground were amply prepared to meet every requirement and responsibility. The Governor of the State of California, Hon. C. C. Young, was personally on the ground within some 10 or 12 hours, assisting in the direction of relief work and pledging the power and resources of the State to the full discharge of all humanitarian responsibility. The mayor of the city of Los Angeles and other representatives of the city were equally punctual in their efforts in rendering relief duty, and also representatives of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce were present cooperating with the other agencies in every way possible. The Los Angeles County authorities placed at command of the relief committees every available means. Temporary buildings were readily constructed for the treatment and care of the injured and stricken people. Physicians, nurses, and other attendants were detailed for such service as could be rendered by them. The city council of the city of Los Angeles met within a few days after the dam gave away and appropriated a million dollars of ready money for immediate relief. This is being expended in first aid and also for the rehabilitation of the farm lands along the river requiring immediate repair and reconstruction work. In this connection it is proper to say that the city of Los Angeles has assumed all legal and moral responsibility for the giving away of the dam. Conservative estimates place the property damage at not less than $5,000,000. It is altogether probable that it may double that amount. Regardless, however, of whatever the amount may be, the city of Los Angeles is amply able and eager to meet, in so far as possible, every obligation, both legal and moral, in this regard.

Mr. BRIGHAM. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the total damage was from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000?

Mr. EVANS of California. The total damage is being estimated now, and the last report I have is that it will not be less than $5,000,000, and possibly twice that amount.

Mr. BRIGHAM. I thought there was some report that it exceeded $100,000,000.

Mr. EVANS of California. Those were simply speculations made immediately following the catastrophe.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I may be repeating, but it is the general understanding now, is it not, that the city of Los Angeles it going to make good the loss suffered?

Mr. EVANS of California. It is not only the general understanding, but the city of Los Angeles has already publicly and officially, through its government, its mayor, and city council, assumed entirely every responsibility, both morally and legally, for this disaster; and I know from information that I have received from the city of Los Angeles that this relief work is now going on, that 2,000 or more men are in the valley now cleaning up, and the city of Los Angeles has established a temporary office in the valley overseeing this work and the expenditure of this money.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It is a most commendable spirit that has been manifested by the great city of Los Angeles, the like of which I am not able to recall in the history of America. I think that ought to be said, to the credit of that great city. [Applause.]

Mr. EVANS of California. Mr. Chairman, at this time I ask unanimous consent to insert in my remarks a letter which I received this morning from the president of the chamber of commerce from the city of Los Angeles, touching the very question raised by the gentleman from Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to insert at this point a letter, just referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

THE LOS ANGELES CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
April 4, 1928.

Hon. W. E. EVANS, M. C.,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN EVANS: The mayor has sent to us your telegram of March 27, asking for data showing the ready response by the city, county, and State to relief work in the St. Francis Dam disaster.

Please be advised that immediately following the catastrophe the National Red Cross got on the job and cooperated most efficiently in handling the emergency relief. Every agency of the State immediately responded with offers to help, and the governor particularly was very kind in sending down Mr. Heron, of the board of control, who coordinated the efforts of the State departments wherein we found we could use them.

The county of Los Angeles, through its sheriff's department, immediately took up the task of handling the situation in Los Angeles County and covered it in a splendid way, so that we had little to handle from that angle.

The difficulty was to handle the situation in Ventura County, and there again we received the most complete cooperation from their officials and from the communities in the valley, particularly from Santa Paula, where Mr. C. C. Teague took charge of the Ventura County committee and cooperated splendidly.

Immediately following the disaster the chamber of commerce and the city officials arranged a series of conferences, and within a week's time $1,000,000 was placed at the disposal of a special rehabilitation committee, organized by the city council, with our cooperation, of which committee the undersigned is chairman.

We have organized the work, in cooperation with the Ventura County committee, so that the rehabilitation of the valley is proceeding rapidly. This work is divided into several groups, such as agricultural rehabilitation, homes, personal losses, etc., and everything is moving along splendidly.

Arrangements are now being made by the water bureau to secure the necessary funds to complete the rehabilitation work, and there will be no slowing up of the effort to get the valley back to normal in the shortest possible time.

I need not say to you that Los Angeles did not hesitate to assume the responsibility for the whole difficulty without quibbling over the legalities of the situation, and this has met an instant response on the part of the people in the devastated region.

I would appreciate it very much if you would make a statement to Congress of the spirit of Los Angeles in this matter in accepting the fullest responsibility and immediately organizing relief without quibbling. I don't think there has been any case of a similar nature that has been handled with a greater degree of satisfaction to those who have suffered the damage than has this case. Los Angeles intends to pay in full, and we believe that the whole matter will be cleaned up without a single lawsuit of any description.

I would also like to pay my respects, in the highest terms, to the mayor of Los Angeles for the fine stand he took in this matter in urging that the city immediately accept its responsibility and for the fine spirit shown by the members of the city council in support of the mayor's position.

In a catastrophe such as this it brings out very quickly the stuff that men are made of and the attitude of our city officials—the city attorney, the city council, and the mayor—merits our sincere praise and appreciation.

Thanking you for your interest, I am,

Very truly yours,

GEO. L. EASTMAN,
President Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. EVANS of California. Now that this catastrophe has passed, with its toll of life and property, the public is interested in knowing its cause and what, if anything, can be gained from its disastrous effect. Immediately following the breaking of this dam Governor Young, of the State of California, appointed a commission to investigate the causes leading to the failure of the dam, consisting of six of the most eminent and well-known engineers and geologists obtainable, with instructions to the commission as follows:

Not only California but all the Nation has been appalled by the dreadful calamity which has befallen the beautiful Little Santa Clara River Valley, in Los Angeles and Ventura Counties. This is a matter in which there are obviously three parties at interest—the stricken area of the two counties, the city of Los Angeles, and the public at large. All of these are obviously equally anxious to learn all of the facts connected with this disaster.

I accordingly feel that it is a duty of the State to assemble a commission of eminent engineers and scientists to investigate the causes leading to the failure of the St. Francis Dam.

The prosperity of California is largely tied up with the storage of its flood waters. We must have reservoirs in which to store these waters if the State is to grow. We can not have reservoirs without dams. These dams must be made safe for the people living below them. All this is both elemental and fundamental.

Accordingly, our duty is a double one. We must learn, if it be possible, just what caused the failure of the St. Francis Dam; the lesson that it teaches must be incorporated into the construction of future dams. There must be no repetition of this catastrophe if it is humanly possible to prevent it.

On the 24th day of March, 1928, after making thorough investigation of the dam site and the specifications under which the dam was built and the geological conditions of the canyon where the dam was located, the commission of investigation made its report, which is as follows:

1. The failure of St. Francis Dam was due to defective foundations.

2. There is nothing in the failure of the St. Francis Dam to indicate that the accepted theory of gravity-dam design is in error or that there is any question about the safety of concrete dams designed in accordance with that theory when built upon even ordinarily sound bedrock. On the contrary, the action of the middle section, which remains standing even under such adverse conditions, is most convincing evidence of the stability of such structures when built upon firm and durable bedrock.

Third. The failure of this dam indicates the desirability of having all such structures erected and maintained under the supervision and control of State authorities. Water storage, with its necessary concomitant dams and embankments, is peculiarly essential to the development of California resources, and in the great majority of cases failures would result in serious loss of life and property. This disaster emphasizes the fact that while the benefits accrue to the builders of such projects, the failures bring disaster to others who have no control over the design, construction, and maintenance of the works. The police power of the State certainly ought to be extended to cover all structures impounding any considerable quantities of water.

Respectfully submitted.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of California. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. A number of questions have been asked as to the type of dam this was. As the gentleman knows, there are three types of masonry dams—the gravity type, the arch type, and the hollow type. The gravity type is the type of dam containing enough material to hold back the pressure of the water. The arch type depends upon a series of arches to hold back the pressure of the water. The hollow type is a series of buttresses with a concrete face to hold back the pressure of the water. The gentleman asked me the other day regarding such matters, and I take pleasure in informing him.

Mr. EVANS of California. Briefly, and in common language, the dam failed because it was not built upon a solid foundation. There was nothing lacking in the construction or in the material used in construction. As evidence of this the governor's commission very aptly points to the large section of the center part of the dam that was left standing unmoved from its base. This particular part of the dam, as the commission points out, was on a solid foundation, and had the entire dam been so located the breaking would not have occurred.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of California. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. In conversation with the gentleman the other day we were talking about the need of geologists in the investigation of dam sites. Undoubtedly there was pervious clay on top of this superstructure. It was dry, and it was to all intents and purposes rock, but as soon as the water hit it, it dissolved. There are many types of that kind of rock throughout the desert country, and it is simply an instance where the minutest detail was not figured on in the construction of a great structure.

Mr. EVANS of California. I read from the report of the commission, as follows:

There can be no question but that such a dam properly built upon a firm and unyielding foundation would be safe and permanent under all conceivable conditions, except perhaps faulting and earthquake shocks of tremendous violence. Indeed, such a dam may properly be deemed to be among the most durable of all man-made structures. Unfortunately in this case the foundation under the entire dam left very much to be desired. * * *

A fact which should be very reassuring as to the stability of a gravity dam on reasonably sound bedrock is that although the central section still standing must have been exposed to tremendous and sudden stresses amounting to shocks, while still subject to practically full-water pressure it is undisturbed except from an apparent movement at the top of some 5.5 inches downstream and 6 inches toward the easterly abutment.

So the conclusion necessarily forces itself upon us that by this disastrous experience the efficacy and durability of a concrete dam is proven, and when built on a solid bedrock foundation, impervious to the soluble effects of water and anchored at each end to the same sort of solid structure, safety is reasonably assured. In other words, there is no more indictment coming out of this experience against dams as such, or high dams, or against concrete gravity structures of this kind, than there was against the building of more theaters after the terrible Knickerbocker Theater collapse that occurred in this city several years ago, or against using ocean transports after the horrible wreck by which the Titanic sank to the bottom of the ocean with its cargo of hundreds of human beings. On the contrary, the reliability of the concrete structure is adequately demonstrated when properly located. Beginning with the breaking of the Johnstown Dam in 1889, we have had 19 major dam failures in this country down to the present time, with an attendant loss of life of about 2,800 people and property loss of probably $30,000,000.

As pointed out by Governor Young in his instructions to the investigating commission appointed by him, the prosperity of the great western arid and semiarid sections of our country is largely, if not entirely, tied up with the storage of flood waters. We must have reservoirs in which to store these waters if these sections of the United States continue to grow and develop. The development of a number of our Western States has been the result of storing and conserving flood waters and it may be very properly and consistently said that development along this line has merely begun. Undoubtedly the next 50 years will bring many more large storage reservoirs of far greater capacity than any that have been built up to this time, and it is safe to predict and even to expect that the dams built following this catastrophe will be the safest dams ever built. The lesson taught by this failure will have impressed itself deeply on the minds of the people, and every workman on construction projects of this kind will feel a sense of personal responsibility to do and perform every duty that is placed upon him in the most efficient manner possible. The engineers who locate and construct future dams will for many years carry in their minds a picture of this dam failure and it is safe to assume that greater precaution will prevail in the execution of this kind of construction as a result of the lessons learned.

Now that this terrible disaster has passed, one of the most pathetic things left in its wake is Mr. William Mulholland, the builder. He was not caught and destroyed along with the hundreds of others that fell its victims, but his heart is crushed and his life burdened with a load entirely too much for him to carry. He is now far into his seventies. I know him personally and he is my friend, and I know him to be an honest, capable, good man. When he was informed of this thing of horror, he remarked that his only regrets were that he did not go with the others. Mr. Mulholland sat in my office only a few weeks ago here in the Capitol and recounted to me and others present during our evening's visit the history of literally dozens of dams, reservoirs, and other works that he had constructed or superintended. Up to that time everyone of these dams and structures had proven successful. It has been said of him, and I think it can undoubtedly be proven, that he has built more such works than any living man in America to-day. This one has failed. He says that something must have been overlooked, and that he takes on himself all human responsibility. It is not difficult to understand how something could be overlooked by a man who has carried such tremendous responsibilities on his shoulders for 50 years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. EVANS of California. May I have 10 minutes more?

Mr. MURPHY. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. EVANS of California. Up until the collapse of this dam a few weeks ago all were highly successful. He conceived the project of the gigantic aqueduct that cost the city $34,000,000, and is worth several times that amount of money. Without the conception and genius over Mr. Mulholland for 50 years the city of Los Angeles, now a city of one and a quarter million people, would not have been more than half as large as it is to-day. So my deepest sympathy goes out to Mr. Mulholland. I know he is an able man and a conscientious man. In this case something was simply overlooked. The dam had been built only a few years.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of California. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Something was probably overlooked without anything having been overlooked when it was constructed. Every precaution known to science may have been taken. Nobody was to blame.

Mr. EVANS of California. That is altogether possible.

Mr. MADDEN. I am rather inclined to mitigate in large measure any possible criticism upon the construction of that dam.

Mr. EVANS of California. I thank the gentleman for that statement. I know that is the feeling throughout the country. If you were to know Mr. Mulholland as I know him you would entertain the same idea, if you knew his great work in that country.

Mr. ARENTZ. I think the gentleman from Illinois is correct, and we must recognize the fact that every dam is an entity in itself. Each one differs from the other as much as the materials that enter into the dam differ, or the size of the dam, or the surface configuration on which the dam is built. Mr. Mulholland no doubt used every precaution in the world, but some little condition intervened, even though the scientists overlooked it.

Mr. EVANS of California. So I say my heart goes out to him in deepest sympathy, and I am sure that this feeling is concurred in by the people of southern California generally.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, if there are no further speakers, I suggest that the Clerk read the bill for amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. That is a good idea.

Mr. MURPHY. There are no Members who want to talk now, although some time has been promised to them. There are other things engrossing the attention of a number of Members of Congress to-day, so I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MADDEN. When I hear a good suggestion, one that has the wisdom in it that was expressed by the gentleman from Louisiana, I can not help but concur in it.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I spoke rather hastily, but I feel that when you grant time to Members they ought to be here to use it, and there is no use in delaying matters. But, as the gentleman from Ohio says, there are some Members who expected we would discuss this bill Thursday and Friday. I am willing to concur in the motion made by the gentleman from Ohio, but I think Members who want time should be ready to proceed Thursday.

Mr. MADDEN. Is some occult influence at work?

Mr. MURPHY. I assure the great chairman of this committee that I do not feel any inward impulse of any kind at this time, but I think, in fairness to the Members who are not here this afternoon, the committee should now rise, and I will so move.

Mr. MADDEN. I always defer to the judgment of the gentleman from Ohio when he rises, as I do to every other gentleman from Ohio when he rises.

Mr. MURPHY. I thank the chairman. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAWLEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12875) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio the purpose of the committee in rising at this time?

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Texas must have some lurking notion about it.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Well, no. I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio for the benefit of the RECORD, and especially for the benefit of the Members of the House, if he expects this bill to take the balance of the week outside of Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. MURPHY. That is my understanding. I will say to the gentleman from Texas it is expected to have debate on this bill the rest of the week.

Mr. MADDEN. I am not so sure about that.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Do you hope to pass it this week?

Mr. MURPHY. We hope to pass it this week.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. But it will take the balance of the week outside of to-morrow?

Mr. MURPHY. That is the intention.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Why do you want to quit at 2 o'clock?

Mr. SANDLIN. The gentleman from Ohio is not to blame and I want to be fair about the matter. I had yielded time to gentlemen on this side but they are not here to speak.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. One of the ways to meet the situation when gentlemen get time and are not here is to read the bill and pass it and let them get time on some other bill.

Mr. MURPHY. I appreciate the judgment of the gentleman from Texas, but I also have a responsibility toward the membership of the House both on his side of the aisle and on this side, and, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Will the gentleman withhold that a moment?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes; I withhold it.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I want to say to the gentleman I am very much disappointed at the action here to-day. I had hoped we would get through with this bill Thursday and then take up flood relief, because in my district we have almost as bad a flood now as we had a year ago, and this is urgent.

Mr. MADDEN. We could not stop that now.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I know that; but it may get worse.

Mr. MADDEN. And I will say to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. OLDFIELD] that if it becomes important and necessary for this bill to be set aside for a day or so in order to act on the flood relief bill we will not object to that.

Mr. OLDFIELD. All right; that is fine.

Mr. MADDEN. We are trying to accommodate our friends everywhere.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Are you not really just using this bill as a kind of buffer so as to have it on tap in case necessity may require its consideration?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, no; this is a serious proposition, I will say to the gentleman from Texas.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, April 11, 1928, at 12 o'clock noon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. McNARY. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. CARAWAY. I desire to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is necessarily detained by reason of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

REPUBLICAN PRESIDENTIAL NOMINATION

Mr. DALE. Mr. President, as I was coming into the Chamber this morning I was handed a copy of to-day's New York Times. I was a little disturbed by what is stated in the Times as a classification of the delegates about to be elected to the Republican National Convention. I have not had any time to formulate what I have to say and it may carry more or less weight because of that fact. I do want to say, however, that on the subject to which I refer I have never exchanged a word directly or indirectly with the President of the United States.

Under the classification in the New York Times it is stated that to the next national convention of the Republican Party the State of Vermont will send its delegates instructed, six for Calvin Coolidge and five for Herbert Hoover. This would mean that Vermont would send a split delegation. Mr. President, Vermont has never sent a split delegation to a national convention. That does not express the character of the people of the State of Vermont. From 1856 on Vermont has sent its delegation for or against some man. He has sometimes been nominated and sometimes he has not been nominated, but Vermont has been for him or against him. When the people of Vermont do anything, they do it that way. It is typical of the people of Vermont. They are for or against a man, or for or against a policy.

It is rather interesting in this connection to note that Vermont is the only State in the Union that has followed that course clear through to the present time. It is the only State in the Union that has cast its electoral vote without fail for a Republican candidate, and it will do the same in the coming election.

I do not undertake to say that the delegation in Congress from Vermont would assume to dictate what Vermont will do. We do not dictate to the people up there. We do not even ask to be sent as delegates from Vermont to the national convention. But the people of Vermont come in and consult with us once in a while when they are here. I have an idea what the people of Vermont will do. I know in my own mind what they ought to do, what is the reasonable thing for the people of Vermont to do, and I express it as my judgment that when Vermont sends her delegates to the national convention she will send them as one man instructed to vote for her native son for President of the United States—Calvin Coolidge.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I was just entering the Chamber when the Senator from Vermont concluded his statement, saying that Vermont would send to the national convention a solid delegation for Mr. Coolidge. I wonder if Mr. Hoover has withdrawn.

YESTERDAY'S ELECTION IN ILLINOIS

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, at the risk of a breach of the proprieties, but certainly with the kindliest intentions, I want to congratulate the great State of Illinois and the splendid Senator from that State on the election held in Illinois yesterday. It restores one's confidence in the people's rule.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania presented a memorial of the Philadelphia (Pa.) Board of Trade, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. 3508) to increase the number of members of the Federal Reserve Board, to make the board more representative, to provide for the proper control and equitable distribution of the credit supply, to establish closer contact between the Congress and its agent, the Federal Reserve Board, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the annual convention of the Iowa Pharmaceutical Association, protesting against the passage of the bill (S. 2035) to regulate the distribution and sale in interstate commerce of certain toilet articles, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Alger Camp, No. 24, United Spanish War Veterans, of Boulder; Victor Candlin Post, American Legion, of Greeley; Robbins-McMullen Post, American Legion, of Grand Junction; Stanley Hardman Post, American Legion, and Auxiliary, of Trinidad; Ray Lines Post, American Legion, of Salida; Harold Dehaan Post, American Legion, of Fort Morgan; and the State regent and Daughters of the American Revolution of Colorado, of Colorado Springs, all in the State of Colorado, praying for the adoption of the proposed naval building program, which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented telegrams and papers in the nature of memorials from the executive board of the city Young Women's Christian Association, of Fort Collins; the Labor College Discussion Club, of Colorado Springs; the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, of Colorado Springs and Boulder; First Baptist Church, of Greeley; First Grand Valley Church of the Brethren, of Grand Junction; Denver Friends Church and the First Congregational Church, of Denver; and sundry citizens of Briggsdale, all in the State of Colorado, remonstrating against the adoption of the proposed naval building program, which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On request of Mr. PHIPPS, the resolutions adopted by Russell A. Alger Camp, No. 24, United Spanish War Veterans, of Boulder, Colo., together with copy of the reply Mr. PHIPPS has sent to all Colorado citizens interested in the subject, were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution

Whereas various pacifist organizations are engaged in an attempt to have the citizens of this community write letters to their Senators and Congressmen urging that all efforts be used to defeat the naval appropriation bill now before Congress; and

Whereas these organizations have prevailed upon various ministers of the community to make similar request of the members of their congregations; and

Whereas the arguments used by these organizations are based upon misrepresentations, both as to the contents of the present bill and as to the effects of the passage thereof; and

Whereas in the opinion of Russell A. Alger Camp, No. 24, United Spanish War Veterans, letters obtained by the means being used do not represent the true concensus of opinion of this community and are signed by many persons without consideration: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by Russell A. Alger Camp, No. 24, United Spanish War Veterans, That we are heartily in favor of the attempt being made by the present naval appropriation bill to place the American Navy upon terms of equality with that of any other navy in the world; and be it further

Resolved, That we are of the opinion that the cause of peace which is ardently desired by all will be advanced by strengthening our Navy; and be it further

Resolved, That the present naval appropriation bill has not been introduced for the purpose of instituting a so-called "naval race" but only to place our Navy on a par with that of Great Britain, not with the idea of competing with England for the greatest navy but with the end in view that the English-speaking peoples may continue to work in harmony for the advancement of world peace; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to our Senators and Representatives in Congress and a copy be given to each of the local newspapers.

RUSSELL A. ALGER CAMP, NO. 24,
UNITED SPANISH WAR VETERANS,
Boulder, Colo.
By IRA C. GROMER, Commander.

Attest:
[SEAL.] GEO. L. EGBERT, Adjutant.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
February 14, 1928.

MY DEAR SIR: Acknowledging receipt of your recent favor, allow me to say that, as in the case of former naval appropriation bills, I am considering the present one in the light of the needs of the United States for preparedness in national defense.

The entire subject is receiving my most careful attention, and I do not feel that there is any occasion for alarm over unnecessary enlargement of the naval program. As you are probably aware, I have consistently supported proper measures to advance the cause of peace among the nations.

Your interest in these important subjects is appreciated.

Yours sincerely, LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS.

SALARIES OF OFFICERS, UNITED STATES COURT FOR CHINA (S. DOC. NO. 83)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State regarding certain legislation authorizing salary increases for the judge and other officers of the United States Court for China. I concur in the view of the Secretary of State, and I therefore request of the Congress legislation amending section 6 of the act of June 30, 1906, Public No. 403, Fifty-ninth Congress, and the act of June 4, 1920, Public No. 238, Sixty-sixth Congress.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 11, 1928.

VICKSBURG NATIONAL MILITARY PARK, MISS.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, there is some need for immediate action on a bill which is now on the calendar, being Order of Business 753, House bill 10564. The bill merely proposes to grant the right to straighten a road through the Vicksburg National Military Park in the State of Mississippi. The Secretary of War has written a letter regarding the matter, in which he states there is no objection on the part of the War Department to the passage of the bill. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. CURTIS. Does the bill propose merely to straighten a road?

Mr. STEPHENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CURTIS. And there will not be any expense to the Government in building the road or anything of that kind?

Mr. STEPHENS. I understand that it will not cost the Government anything at all; in fact, the bill provides that it shall not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 10564) to authorize the Secretary of War to grant and convey to the county of Warren a perpetual easement for public highway purposes over and upon a portion of the Vicksburg National Military Park in the State of Mississippi, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to grant and convey to the county of Warren, State of Mississippi, a perpetual easement for the construction and maintenance of a public highway on the Vicksburg National Military Park, Vicksburg, Miss., at such location and under such conditions as may be approved by the Secretary of War: Provided, That the county of Warren shall perform at its own cost and expense such work as the Secretary of War may require incident to the construction and maintenance of said highway.

SEC. 2. No part of the property granted and conveyed by the Secretary of War for the purposes aforesaid shall be used for any other than highway purposes, and when said property shall cease to be so used it shall revert to the United States of America.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ACCEPTANCE OF STATUE OF ANDREW JACKSON

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate House Concurrent Resolution 29, to which he calls the attention of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TYSON]. The clerk will read the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (H. Con. Res. 29), as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the statue of Andrew Jackson by Mrs. Belle Kinney Scholz, presented by the State of Tennessee, to be placed in Statuary Hall, is accepted in the name of the United States, and that the thanks of Congress be tendered the State for the contribution of the statue of one of its most eminent citizens, illustrious for his distinguished services to the country in war and in peace.

Second. That a copy of these resolutions, suitably engrossed and duly authenticated, be transmitted to the Governor of Tennessee.

Mr. TYSON. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

NATIONAL GUARD STAFF OFFICERS

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, some days ago House bill 239, of similar tenor to the bill (S. 1838) to amend section 110 of the national defense act by repealing and striking therefrom certain provisions prescribing additional qualifications for National Guard State staff officers, and for other purposes, was substituted for that measure and passed. It was understood at the time of the passage of the House bill that the Senate bill would be indefinitely postponed, but as the bill appears on the calendar apparently that has not been done. I ask unanimous consent that it be done now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, Senate bill 1838 will be indefinitely postponed.

ADDRESS OF WILLIAM E. DODD, LL. D.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I have here a copy of an interesting address entitled "A Farmer to Lawyers," which was delivered by Dr. William E. Dodd, professor of American history in the University of Chicago, to the graduating class of the John Marshall Law School. Doctor Dodd sets forth his practical observations based on personal experience in operating a Virginia farm. I ask unanimous consent to have the address printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A FARMER TO LAWYERS

I

Members of the graduating class, lasting changes in the social order come slowly. A hundred and fifty years ago the farmer and the free tenant were the makers of a new nation. Their representatives a little later formulated one of the greatest of Constitutions. To-day the farmer and the tenant seem clearly on the road to peasantry, and neither they nor any of their few friends seem able to stay their downward course.

If this process continues, the United States will cease to be what it was or is intended to be, and the process hastens. The efforts at cooperative marketing, of controlled production, and of effective legislation seem all to have failed. The President vetoes bills without offering better ones; the open-and-shut markets of the cities continue their unmitigated exploitation; while newer and richer lands cease to offer relief, as of old.

The farmers, who composed 98 per cent of the population in the beginning—and then were only fairly able to direct the policy of the country—now number some 40 per cent of the population and frantically hope to direct national policy. The prospect is so poor that 649,000 farmers abandoned their calling in 1926; 3,000,000 have abandoned it since 1920, while all the cities increase their numbers with little thought or care for the future. Is there any help? Possibly a hasty review of our history may offer an answer.

II

From the adoption of the Constitution till the fall of Napoleon the farmers of the young Nation, proud of their country and happy to be called free farmers, sold their abundant crops to a warring Europe at fabulous prices. Washington said there had never been anything like it; President Jefferson found the returns of the farmers twenty times as great per year as he had ever known them to be in the best days of his youth. Whether the Government was administered by doubtless aristocrats, afraid of their new system, or the boisterous Democrats boasting of the best Government ever set up by the hand of man, prosperity was the rule of the day, above all, for the farmers.

Then the wars of Napoleon ceased. After a dizzy moment of drunken prosperity the Europeans reduced their demands by half. American wheat and tobacco and pigs lost all value to their producers. Farmers were in the throes of deflation, a term then hardly known. John Adams, retired to his little farm, was barely able to hold up a respectable head. Thomas Jefferson, with a hundred slaves, was hardly able to feed his guests. Virginia farms would hardly sell for the price of a year's rent. From Massachusetts to Georgia thousands and tens of thousands of farmers abandoned their homes and lands and trekked across the Alleghenies to try their fortunes anew in the wilderness.

The savings of small farmers for a generation, the houses, the fences, and the cleared lands were sadly abandoned to mother nature. Hanover County, in Virginia, where the Revolution had started, and the Springfield country of Massachusetts, each lost half its population. Times were hard. Governments, State and national, did nothing. Who could help a farmer?

But during the long Napoleonic wars hundreds and thousands of industrial establishments were set up. They made the bonnets of farmers' wives; fashioned boots for the clumsy feet of plowmen; contrived new and better plows for the making of more wheat and tobacco. The moment Napoleon fell British industrialists offered marvelous bonnets and all manner of implements to farmer folk at prices half as high as the domestic manufacturers asked. If the farmer sold any of his crop, he might buy imports at half war-time prices. But the industrialist would be ruined. He would have to become a farmer, abandon his buildings and his improvements. Did the Government lend assistance?

In 1816 the farmer nationalists, led by farmer statesmen, Calhoun and Clay, contrived a system of industrial help, a tariff that reduced British competition by half, and thus opened the American market by half.

In a few years the industrialist was more than successful. Few trekked over the mountains. But success by Government assistance increased the number of industrialists twofold. They began to compete among themselves. In 8 years they asked for a monopoly of the American market; in 12 they got their wish in a tariff that eliminated the farmers—the tariff of abominations, 1828. But Jefferson's beautiful estate, which had cost $25,000, was sold in 1828 for $2,800, his daughter accepting gifts for her maintenance in her old age. The only farmer who could hold his own was the cotton grower, and he held his own on a market that steadily declined from 40 cents to 8 cents a pound for cotton grown by slave labor on fresh lower southern lands.

Here was an illustration: The clever men, who composed less than a tenth of the population, procured from the Government a monopoly of the great American market; the unclever farmers, who composed 90 per cent of the population, sold their output in a slow European market in competition with the whole world, and then came home to buy their clothing and farm utensils at prices twice as high as those at which they might have had them in Europe. That was called statesmanship.

There was great bitterness in all the great farming States, bitter words, and angry threats of disrupting the Government, civil war was narrowly averted, the farmers yielding at last to the desires and the fears of the minority. That was 1833; and there followed a compromise by which the industrialists were to accept, after 10 years, a reduction of their privileges and allow some measure of competition from the outside. There followed an epoch of economic peace and a marvelous prosperity from 1846, the lowest tariff, to 1861, when the moderate rates of 1816 were effective. It was the end of the first chapter.

III

Then war again. The farmers of the Northwest, rallying to the call of the Union and of Abraham Lincoln, went upon southern battle fields and fought, as men have rarely fought, southern farmers even more heroic. In the process there arose in Chicago a great inventor manufacturer. He put drills and reapers upon the grain fields whence hundreds of thousands of farmers' sons had gone to war. Old men and women made more wheat and raised more pigs than had been raised in time of peace. And war raised the price a hundred per cent. Abraham Lincoln was winning the war for the Union. Then English and Germans harvests failed—failed in 1862 and 1863. There was an unprecedented demand for American wheat, and even corn. The price rose from 50 cents a bushel in 1861 to $2.50 in 1865. War and Cyrus McCormick, a good Virginian, gave the farmers a prosperity they had not known since Washington and Jefferson had built the Nation on farmer prosperity. It was a strange time, a loyal Southerner in Chicago winning the war against the South.

But the war also made tens of thousands of industries flourish in unwonted style. Woolen mills earned fortunes, implement makers quadrupled their dividends, munitions makers had the time of their lives, and railroad builders and managers laid the foundations of fortunes that a little later dazed the world. It was war, war for democracy.

The Union was saved. There was a northern debt of $3,000,000,000, a debt evidenced by bonds, payable in gold and in paper money as well. When the war ended these bonds, or more than 90 per cent of them, hastened to Philadelphia and New York and Boston, where, under the new banking system, the control of the Nation's currency had drifted. The end also witnessed, after a feverish day of speculative prosperity, a decline of the price of farm products. The decline became a slump. The hundreds of thousands of soldiers, farmers' sons, went home to their farms. They increased the output of the farms while Europe decreased her demands for American wheat and corn and pigs. Was the farmer again to fall a victim?

The price of woolen goods fell. Munitions were no longer needed. But southern cotton came back on the market and cotton cloths were in reasonable demand. But fearing the future, as business men ever fear the future, the industrialists asked protection against every sort of competition in order that they might pay high wages—and then sent to Europe for hundreds of thousands of workers to keep wages down. The Government (all the southern planter lawmakers kept at a safe distance) granted the protection and sent agents to Europe to urge immigration, immigration that mounted to half a million a year in a little while. It was privilege, vast privilege.

The farmer, as I have said, went home to his fields in 1865. The price of wheat fell from $2.50 a bushel in 1865 to 60 cents in 1896. However, the vast fields of the West lay wide open and the land was free. The drill, the corn planter, and the reaper enabled the farmer to produce untold quantities of grain and livestock. It was the day of free trade in England and Germany. Hence, the men who had fought the battle of common men in the Civil War now poured their wheat into European markets to ruin their brethren in Europe. They drove the English farmers into bankruptcy, if a farmer knows what that means. Industrial cities took these ruined farmers into their employ or left them to emigrate to the United States—millions of them.

But the United States, after her war for democracy, kept the tariff bars so high that the goods of European mills could not get to the toiling farmers of the West and South, while vast fleets turned hordes of poor European workers into New England and the Middle States and literally changed the face of the country—a revolution, nobody observing it.

Nor was this all. The farmers back on their farms must pay the cost of their own fighting in the Civil War, $3,000,000,000, a then unprecedented sum. They received greenbacks for their wheat at low rates. They paid for their supplies in greenbacks at high prices, because the Government compelled them to do so. They wished to pay the debt in greenbacks, debts owed to a small number of men who had done little fighting. The Government compelled them to pay in gold; gold then—and long after 1865—at a premium of 25 per cent.

It was perhaps necessary, but it looked unfair; the tariff-protected industry in its demand for high prices; it now protected the holders of the debt in a similar demand for high prices, high prices for bonds that had been bought for 60 or 70 cents on the dollar. The farmer had gone home to pay himself for fighting. In order to do so he had to ruin European farmers. With the meager returns he paid in gold the debt that had been bought in greenbacks. That was statesmanship.

The statesmanship of Sherman and Blaine and Grant; but it did not lend good humor to the countenance of western farmers. The world was a sad complex, all bound together in spite of wars and tariffs; the victims were the men who had saved the Union. What of the cotton farmers, stepchildren of the Republic? Their fight had failed—needful failure. Their debt to themselves was simply canceled, repudiated to break down all inequality, to make democracy real in the South. The price of cotton was high. It took 20 years for the South to get back to normal in the cotton markets, the price of each crop falling. The South was poorer than it was safe for any great section to be, many thousands moving away to the Southwest, where land was free. Others moved into the Northwest to make wheat cheaper than it was. Lands and ancient homes were deserted as lands and homes had been deserted in 1820–1830.

Somebody set about a scheme to unite the restless West with the broken South. If they united they might control the United States and learn the way to self help, farmers thus taking the control of things into their own hands, as they had done when young Calhoun and Clay tried their powers in 1820, tariffs and paper money and great banks to the contrary notwithstanding. But then somebody reminded them that the two sections of farmers had waged the Civil War. They must vote as they had shot; and children must vote as fathers had shot. There was an end of farmer self-help. Neither Bryan nor Roosevelt found any way to share with the farmers the vast and unprecedented prosperity of the new and unprecedented Republic. A single State in the East received twice as much of the annual income of the country as all the 13 Southern States!

Hundreds of thousands of farmers and children of farmers moved into the thriving cities. They sought places in the mills, on the railroads, in the great business houses, counting the money.

But in the cities, the glare of electric lights blinding men's eyes, the vanities of politicians deceiving their minds, the sons of farmers met the incoming hordes of Europe, poor European farmers competing with poor American farmers—all being led by the garish lights of a new and marvelous revolution which filled the world with cities and filled the cities with hosts of strange men talking strange languages, talking and drinking—then organizing and fighting.

Workingmen's unions, high prices for the better grades of labor; employers' unions setting higher prices on manufactured goods, on the products of the farm; tradesmen guilds that took from the farmers their pigs and lambs, their fruit and vegetables at prices of their own making, sometimes sending to the farmers demands for more money with which to pay the freight on what had been taken; marvelous cities and more marvelous statesmen, those of Roosevelt's and Bryan's restless day.

Only Europe making ready for another war and organized labor talking of a coming class struggle relieved a little the strain of things during the first decade of the twentieth century. The great farmer's country was ceasing to be a farmer's country, hundreds of thousands trekking again, their earthly possessions on their backs, into the cold northwestern stretches of Canada—the populations of the cities ever mounting into the millions, that of the country declining to less than half the total of the country, western farmers still hating southern farmers. By that process the politicians sustained themselves and the exploitation went on. The first of the great wars of the young Republic started the process, 1812–1815; the second and greater sectional war carried it further, 1861–1865. Would there be another war?

IV

In 1914 the leaders of the German Empire precipitated Europe into a war long prepared for, a war which, like every preceding war, upset the life and changed the destiny of farmers on the wide plains of free America. It was not long till pigs sold again at fabulous prices and cotton set poor southerners' heads crazy. Ten cents a pound for pork on the hoof, 20 cents a pound for cotton leaving the gins, beef and wheat likewise pouring at similar prices into the great caldron of war. The cities filled all the industrial chimneys with insufferable smoke; the railroads wore out their tracks and their wheels carrying their burdens of munitions at huge profit to the scene of red and devastating war. A third time the industrialists and the farmers were prosperous together, farmers driving Fords, business men Packards. Prosperity!

Would it last? But the roar of war become more and more audible. The President of the Republic came slowly to see that a German victory would work a change in the social status of the modern world, not omitting the United States. He, like Lincoln, thought to make the world safe for democracy, his opponents wondering whether they would like a democratic world, quite as Lincoln's opponents had wondered. He led the farmers into the war, millions of the sons of farmers, along with their fellows from the cities. The price of wheat rose $1 a bushel; cotton now sold for 30 cents a pound, and pigs at 15 cents on the hoof. War was the bonanza of the farmer, devastating war, the price of land mounting, the migrating westerners coming back to their abandoned homes, poor negroes hastening to northern cities to fill the vacant places the fighting Europeans could not fill. It was revolution blessed with amazing prosperity.

But the war came to an end. There was again a day of deceitful riches; and then a collapse, first of farmers, next of business in the cities. The world outside struggled between war and peace, the President, broken and hated for his scheme of peace that was failing, departed. He gave place to another, to a new régime that would save business if nothing else—a city régime made up of the fragments of all nations, bent upon a policy of oblivion and isolation. It was but another day till Europe once more ceased to buy cotton and wheat and pigs; the farmers were cast down from their high prosperity. Cotton could not be sold; wheat fell below the cost of production—dire distress. From 1921 till the present moment the experience of 1820, of 1866, repeated itself.

There was poverty wherever men produced the foodstuffs of the country; fair prosperity elsewhere. But the fears of 1921, like those of 1866 and afterwards, raised again the protecting wall against European competitors who would see European goods at low prices and buy American farm products at rising prices. The fear of cheap imports raised the tariff walls higher than ever before. That secured the prosperity of business; it doomed the farmer, for no protective tariff could help him, nor were rich, vacant lands anywhere.

Somehow society found a way to relieve the fears and distress of those who own mills, run railroads, and operate the finances of the country. The price of manufactured products scarcely fell at all; the returns on railway investments were stabilized by official guaranty of 5½ per cent; the banks lent money at fixed and stable rates. Everybody received help save those who needed it. Statesmanship!

The farmers sought legislation in their behalf. They failed. The farmers of sufficient wealth and alertness organized and undertook, like organized labor, to help themselves. Business turned upon them with anger and fear; nothing was quite so wicked as the Farmer-Labor Party of the Dakotas or the effort of La Follette and his kind to compel national assistance. Some men, like CHARLES G. DAWES and Frank O. Lowden, thought they saw the injustice of it all. They were hushed up, threatened with ruin if they spoke their protests. The year 1924 registered the biggest protest against farmer self-help that was ever registered.

And now the farmer sells in city markets controlled by the buyers; he sells his surplus of wheat and beef in Europe at a price which competition with Australia and South America fixes; all the vast funded debt of the Great War is collected in a few hands in eastern cities, and the nations of Europe owe the United States sums three times as large as the national debt of 1866, the evidence of these debts being in the safety vaults of the great cities.

If the farmer organizes to command his own prices, the prices of what he buys will be raised in proportion, for organized labor would strike when the price of bread rose. If the farmer suggests that protection to manufacturers be lowered for his benefit, he is frightened with a threat of economic panic. If he timidly suggests that European debts be lowered or canceled in the hope of better European markets, he is reminded of "repudiation," as he was in 1870. Then he goes once more to Congress, where he procures the passage of a law which was designed to benefit him. The President vetoes it.

Is the American farmer to become a peasant? If the sons of farmers continue to fill the vacuum of the cities due to restricted immigration, if the wealthier farmers and prosperous men from the cities continue to buy great tracts of land and set up industrial units of the farms, there may be a new farm feudalism which may secure a reasonable return for farm products. That would mean the slow disappearance of the millions of free, "independent" farmers, such as Jefferson imagined when the Republic was created. It would surely mean great numbers of the more stupid of the country working for wages or as tenants on the lands of others, working and unable to better their condition, unambitious and broken like their forbears in Europe.

If the farmers become peasants the wide "foreign districts" of the cities will hardly escape a similar lot. Is that to be the outcome of "free lands for all," of free speech and self-government, of that fine program of democracy which for more than a century has been held out to the underdogs of Europe? If history has any lessons for men, it offers this warning and remonstrance.

It is not a day for complacent big-city politics. Is it peasantry for the farmers and feudalism in the world of industry and business? Southern men and western leaders might well take stock of their resources and seek a new deal in the politics of the time.

GOVERNOR SMITH'S CANDIDACY

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial from the Statesville (N. C.) Daily relative to the candidacy of Governor Smith.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, what is the request?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey asks to have printed in the RECORD an editorial in connection with the candidacy for President of Governor Smith. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

J. W. BAILEY FOR SMITH

Mr. Josiah William Bailey's decision to support Governor Smith means, it is believed, a considerable strengthening of the Smith forces in the State. For many years Mr. Bailey has been a Democratic leader—a real leader of consequence. He was a candidate against Governor McLean four years ago and received strong support in the primary. It is not supposed, of course, that Mr. Bailey will carry all his following into the Smith column, or that he will try to do that. What is meant is that one of his influence and standing will carry much weight for the New York Governor, and his position will not be easily assailed.

First off, Mr. Bailey's record as to prohibition is above reproach and its sincerity is unquestioned. He was canvassing the State for prohibition and its enforcement when some of our present "outstanding leaders" were not saying much. He is personally as well as politically dry. Second, he has reached the conclusion to support Smith after long deliberation. He has not acted hastily. He dismisses the religious end of the matter without discussion. Mr. Bailey stands for religious freedom in reality, in deed as well as in word. He holds that one of his religious faith (Baptist) can't raise the religious issue against anybody. On the question of prohibition he would ordinarily be against Governor Smith, and on that probably the eminent Raleigh lawyer has hesitated. But he has decided that there are other things that matter. On that point he says:

"When I consider what has been going on in our country since Mr. Harding was inaugurated, I am convinced of my duty to disregard minor matters to the end that our country may be rescued from a party that has despoiled and disgraced it. It is indispensable that the Republican Party shall be driven from power in order that it may cleanse itself and that our country may be cleansed of its corrupting influences. I believe that Governor Smith is the one man who may be relied on to restore the Democratic Party to power, and that not to nominate him will be to invite the risk of giving the Republican Party four, and possibly eight, more years of power at a time when the welfare of our land demands that it shall instantly be turned out."

Mr. Bailey finds in Governor Smith the one hope of Democratic success, of rescuing the country "from a party that has despoiled and disgraced it." Cleansing the country from corrupting influences he naturally contends is essential. He finds in Governor Smith a man of admittedly high character and one of proven executive ability. That, too, is admitted by the unbiased. On the question of prohibition Mr. Bailey says:

"I do not entertain the possibility of repeal of the eighteenth amendment. There is no danger of that. It is not involved. I have no fear that the liquor evil would become worse under the Presidency of Mr. Smith. I think sound progress would be made toward the solution of that vexed problem. I believe that he would bring to the administration of laws enforcing the eighteenth amendment a common sense, a courage, an integrity, and a sincerity of purpose that would prove an invaluable contribution to the cause of temperance and to the solution of the drink evil in so far as it may be solved by law. As matters stand, insincerity and inefficiency are doing more to defeat the purposes of the eighteenth amendment than could possibly be done by any other means. Governor Smith has said that as President he would maintain and enforce the eighteenth amendment. I believe him. Even his enemies testify to his integrity."

As a matter of fact the suggestion of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment is beyond the question. Neither the President of the United States nor Congress could repeal the amendment, nor is it believed that will be tried any time in the near future, if ever. But Governor Smith is not a prohibitionist, does not pretend to be. Those who will vote only for a prohibitionist on the ground that none except those who profess the name of prohibition will enforce the law, will, of course, oppose the governor. But come to think of it we have not since national prohibition had a President who claimed to be a prohibitionist. Harding was not and Mr. Coolidge has said nothing about it. About all the Republican presidential candidates who have declared themselves on prohibition have been content to say they favor the enforcement of the law, and some of them have said they opposed the repeal of the amendment. Not one, so far as recalled, said he opposed any change in the Volstead law. Of the leading candidates, Lowden has not answered and Hoover evaded, except in general terms. Governor Smith does favor the modification of the Volstead Act as to the alcoholic content of intoxicants, on the ground that the present law is dishonest. But in the event Congress should, as would be very doubtful, enlarge the alcoholic content to 2 or 3 per cent, the Smith idea is that the States should have power to say whether they would continue with one-half of 1 per cent, as now, or accept the definition of intoxicants in the improbable event Congress should enlarge the content. None of the Republican candidates have said anything about that. The only difference between them and Smith is that he has told the truth about his position. Democrats who do not favor the increase of the alcoholic content, who feel that would be fatal to prohibition, have ground for opposition to Smith. But they don't know what they will get from the Republicans.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House insisted upon its amendment to the bill (S. 1822) to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer or loan aeronautical equipment to museums and educational institutions, disagreed to by the Senate, agreed to the conference requested by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. JAMES, Mr. WAINWRIGHT, and Mr. GARRETT of Texas were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

S. 1628. An act relating to the office of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital;

H. R. 405. An act providing for horticultural experiment and demonstration work in the southern Great Plains area;

FARM RELIEF

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3555) to establish a Federal farm board to aid in the orderly marketing and in the control and disposition of the surplus of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

Mr. CURTIS. Let the amendment be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, is that the amendment which was stated on yesterday and went over for the day?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. CARAWAY. A number of Senators are now holding a conference on the amendment.

Mr. MCNARY. In view of the conference now being held by some of the Senators representing portions of the South, I ask that the amendment may go over for a few moments.

Mr. CURTIS. I withdraw my request that the amendment be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] makes the request that the amendment go over for a few moments, pending a conference. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and is open to amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment read. I do not know what it is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Tennessee proposes the following amendment:

On page 5 strike out line 17 and down through the period in line 1 on page 6 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 4. (a) Whenever the board determines that any agricultural commodity may thereafter require stabilization by the board through marketing agreements authorized by this act, or whenever the cooperative associations, or other organizations representative of the producers of the commodity, shall apply to the board for the creation and appointment of the advisory council for such commodity, then the board shall notify the President of such determination or application. The President shall thereupon create an advisory council for the commodity. The advisory council shall be composed of seven members to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. No individual shall be eligible for appointment to a commodity advisory council unless he resides in the region in which the commodity is principally grown, and is a producer of the commodity. Prior to the making of any appointment to a commodity advisory council, the board shall transmit to the President for his consideration lists of individuals qualified for appointment, to be submitted to the board by cooperative associations or other organizations representative of the producers of the commodity. The term of office of a member of any commodity advisory council shall be two years. In the event of a vacancy occurring, the President shall fill such vacancy in the same manner as the originally appointed member, and, should Congress not be in session, such appointee shall hold office until 20 days after the convening of the next session of Congress."

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I desire to propose an amendment to the amendment. Commencing on page 2, in line 14 of the printed amendment, I move to strike out the words "appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate" and insert the words "appointed by the board." I also move to strike out the remainder of lines 15, 16, 17, and 18 and the word "commodity," in line 19. I should like to have the attention of Senators who are interested in this particular matter, because the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee seeks to change the whole purpose of the bill. If the amendment I have suggested should be adopted it would read as follows:

The advisory council shall be composed of seven members to be appointed by the board.

Then commencing in line 19——

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is now referring to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; I am referring to that amendment. I propose to strike out the words "prior to the making of any appointment to a commodity advisory council the board shall transmit to the President for his consideration," and provide—

That the board shall appoint the members of the advisory council from a list of individuals submitted to the board by cooperative associations or other organizations representing the producers of the commodity.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I have not been able to follow his amendment.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me explain it if I may to those who are interested in it. Whether Senators are for the bill or not, I wish those who expect to vote on it to understand what the two amendments seek to accomplish. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee seeks to set up an advisory council that shall be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate and shall be composed exclusively of those who are engaged in the production of the commodity for which the particular advisory council is set up. Under that provision, if a man had been a farmer but had become a marketing agent and was familiar with the marketing of the particular commodity he would be ineligible for appointment to the advisory council, although the council deals with marketing and not with production. In other words, one who is skilled in the marketing of a commodity unless he also produces that commodity would be ineligible.

It frequently happens that most of those who deal with the marketing of a commodity are only secondarily interested in its production. Cotton very largely is produced by the colored race in certain sections. The negroes frequently are very able farmers; they are good producers; but their weakness has always been their lack of knowledge of marketing.

The amendment submitted by the Senator from Tennessee proposes to take away from the farmers the right to choose the best agent they can find to carry out their purpose, which is to market their products; for this bill primarily deals not with production, but with marketing. It has been thought by some of us that the farmer ought to be permitted to select as his agent the most skilled man he could find to handle the marketing of his products. And that is what the advisory council deals with exclusively. It has nothing to do with production. It has everything to do with the marketing of the product. Therefore it seems to me and to those who concur in that view that we ought to let the farmer have the right to select whatever agent he may choose.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think that feature of the amendment proposed by me can be easily remedied if the Senator would suggest additional language so as to make it read, for instance, "from producers or from those who engage in the marketing of farm products." I would be perfectly willing to accept such an amendment.

Mr. CARAWAY. I would not object to that, but I want, while I am referring to it, to explain the matter to the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should be perfectly willing to accept the Senator's suggestion as to that feature of the amendment.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then, let me speak about it briefly and see how far we go. We are not only exercising our judgment in a matter concerning the prosperity of 30,000,000 American citizens, but, indirectly, we are affecting every man and woman and child in America by this proposed legislation. If we are going to take over to a certain extent the power that the farmer has to market his products, we ought to let him at least choose the instrumentalities from whatever source he sees fit to employ. He ought to have the same liberty of choosing his agents as has any man engaged in any other private business. If he wants to hire from the State of New York an expert in dealing with the marketing of cotton, although he never saw a stalk of cotton growing, I say let the farmer have the right to choose his agent among those who are entitled to be classed as experts and get them where he pleases. That is what the amendment I have suggested proposes to do.

The next objection is still more vital. The amendment of the Senator from Tennessee seeks to take away from the farmer the right to name his agent and gives it to the President of the United States. It introduces two things that I think are very hurtful. First, it denies the farmer the right to choose his agent, to be responsible for the choice, and to be in control of the agent. It gives him the right only to suggest to the President of the United States a list of names from which he should like to have his agent selected. There is no power to make the President respect that wish.

It requires the farmer to go with his hat under his arm and bow down to the powers that be, whoever may be the President of the United States at that time, and say, "With your permission, I should like to have my agent, who is going to be clothed with power to make me prosperous or to make me poor, named from this list. I have to say, though, that you can name anybody you please, because the Constitution gives you that right."

I do not want to tie the hands of every American farmer by transferring from him the right to select his own agent, and conferring that right upon whoever may be the President of the United States at that particular time. I do not care how friendly a President may be; I know, and every Senator on this floor knows, without impugning the motives of anybody who has been President of the United States, that interests, where they conflict, must trust largely to chance when it comes to the President naming somebody to fill some particular office. Those who do not have our viewpoint and yet are just as honest as we may have the ear of the President of the United States. He must listen to somebody; and therefore we introduce the element of chance where the bill gives us absolute certainty if we do not accept this amendment in this form.

What we who are willing to trust the farmers want is this: Let the advisory council be appointed by the board, but named by the producers of the commodity. The act of the board in that case would be purely ministerial. It would be compelled to respond to the agency that named the list. It would have no discretion. It could not say, "I will take one of 300." If the producers of a product should say, "We want you to name John Smith and Richard Roe," the board would be compelled to name those two people. The President of the United States, however, could name anybody he chose. Therefore, why do you want to take away from the farmers, who are to be most vitally affected, the right to name their own agents?

Who of you, engaged in private business, would be willing to submit to the President of the United States the decision as to who should be the cashier of your bank, or who should be your bookkeeper, or who should be your farm foreman? There is not a Senator on this floor who would say, "I am willing to abdicate my right to have my business run by somebody that I select, and permit it to be run by a man that somebody else selects for me, although that other person may not know anything at all about my industry, and have no interest in it."

Under the amendment as we suggest, that the advisory council shall be appointed by the board from the names of those submitted by the people who produce the agricultural product, there is no uncertainty. The farmer will get whoever he wants. If he makes a mistake, he will know who made it. He can correct it.

If you take the other proposition, however, the President appoints and the Senate confirms; the man is there, and the farmer can not remove him to save his immortal soul. He becomes not the agent of the farmer, because, as we have all observed, under the right to appoint a man to office the appointing power becomes to a certain extent his master. We have seen that, and that is inevitable, and in one respect that is to be commended; but there may be harm in it. If the President names the advisory council, the advisory council no longer is responsive to the farmers, whose welfare it has in its keeping. It is responsive to the power that gave it life—that is, the President of the United States.

Senators, let me ask you to think about it for a minute. If you strike out the provision of the McKellar amendment, which gives to the President the right to appoint the advisory council, and adopt the language suggested, it says that the advisory council shall be appointed by the board from a list named by the farmers themselves, and the board must do it. It has no discretion in the matter. It is a ministerial act. So the farmer gets whoever he desires, and he can remove him when he pleases. He is the farmer's agent. He must represent the farming interest, because he gets his authority there, and he is responsive to that organization. He must account to them, and they can remove him if he proves recreant to his trust.

Are you willing to let the farmer choose his agent? Are you willing to let him say, "After I produce this agricultural product I at least ought to be permitted to name the agent who is going to determine when and how I am to sell it"? That is what there is in the amendment; and I sincerely hope that you will let the farmers name their agent, and let that agent be responsive to the farmers.

It seems to me unthinkable that we are willing here to set up a machine that has to do vitally with the prosperity of the farmer and deny him the exclusive right to control the machine that has to do with his market. It is a serious thing.

If you take the McKellar amendment, which says the advisory council shall be nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, then it is of equal rank with the board; but it has some powers, and the board has some, that are in conflict.

Neither one of them is superior to the other. You have responsibility and power separate, with equal rank, one with power and the other with responsibility. Inevitably, unless human nature changes, you will have conflicts, and the farmer will be the victim of a compromise which will not represent the best judgment of either agency; and necessarily you invite disaster, because another part of that amendment, to which I am now preparing to call your attention, says—and I agree with that—that no marketing period may be begun or terminated by the board without the assent of a majority of the advisory council. In other words, the board may find out that the facts are such that they ought to begin a marketing process in a certain product, but they can not do it until the advisory council says they may; or, having begun it, the board may find out that the conditions have changed, and they ought to discontinue it and let the farmer market as he pleases, and pay no equalization fee, but they can not do it unless the advisory council shall assent thereto.

They are both named by the President. They are both confirmed by the Senate. They have equal powers. One can not act without the other. They are necessarily, in my judgment, certain to come into conflict at some time; and the farmer is the helpless victim between these two powers, set up by the same agency, appointed by the same man, confirmed by the same Senate, and clothed with the same authority.

Senators, let me say that I am not unmindful of the grave responsibility that we assume when we enact this legislation. I am not unmindful that among many highly intelligent farmers there is grave apprehension that it may prove disastrous instead of helpful. I am not unmindful that it is an experiment. I have not indulged and I do not indulge the hope and the belief that the great benefits predicted by some will flow from the enactment of this legislation. I am hopeful that it will point the way to the solution of a problem that is crying out for solution; that it will make it possible for the farmers to cooperate 100 per cent, and therefore become the masters of their own destiny instead of being the creatures of an industrial system that has been destroying them. That is all the hope that the legislation can hold out. If it has sympathetic and intelligent administration, it may realize the dream of those who have given years of their life to bring it about. If it has unsympathetic or unintelligent administration, it is going to bring humiliation and shame upon the people who have advocated its passage.

Therefore let us not tie the farmer hand and foot to the whim of the President of the United States; and I am not aspersing the President.

I am satisfied that he would do the very best he knew how; but he must take somebody's viewpoint, and that viewpoint may not be the viewpoint of the producers of these products, and therefore the instrumentality chosen may not be responsive to their needs. You can, however, write into the bill a provision that makes the farmer the absolute master of that situation. Nobody can be his agent unless he selects him, and nobody can continue to be his agent unless he wills that he shall be so. He will be responsive to the farmer, and therefore the farmer will have nobody to blame but himself if he gets a bad agent, and he will have the power to remove him if he is unresponsive to his needs.

I say that now because this other amendment follows that I referred to, providing that the advisory council shall have the power to veto the very heart and purpose of this bill if it wants to.

I am willing for the advisory council to have that power provided the advisory council is actually the agent of the producer, named by the producer and responsive to the producer, and subject to be removed by the producer if it proves unfaithful to its trust.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to ask the Senator some questions for information. I have not read the bill very carefully up to this time.

As I understand, the bill provides that the advisory council shall be appointed by the board.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is it.

Mr. SWANSON. This amendment provides that the advisory council shall be appointed by the President.

Mr. CARAWAY. And confirmed by the Senate; that is it. That is the difference.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand, the Senator's contention is that we can not make limitations in fixing the conditions upon which the President shall or shall not make appointments, and that under a recent decision the President has absolute, unlimited power of removal.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is it.

Mr. SWANSON. If the advisory council did not concur with the policy of the President, if this amendment is adopted he could remove every member of the advisory council?

Mr. CARAWAY. Absolutely.

Mr. SWANSON. And retain or reappoint people agreeable to him, to carry out his policies?

Mr. CARAWAY. That is it.

Mr. SWANSON. The Supreme Court decided that Congress has the power of creating an agency to appoint minor officers, whom the President would not have the power of removing. Was not that included in the decision?

Mr. CARAWAY. Of course; the President would have nothing to do with this advisory council.

Mr. SWANSON. The board would appoint the advisory council, and they would be compelled to appoint whom the farmers selected?

Mr. CARAWAY. That is it. The language is that they shall name whoever the farmers select.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator's contention is that they can do that under the Constitution, when the Congress creates this board with the power, and they will be compelled to obey the direction to do that. The Senator's contention is that the President would not be compelled to obey it, under the Constitution, as his is a constitutional office and power.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is it.

Mr. SWANSON. The President could remove them at his will; but could this board do so?

Mr. CARAWAY. The board would have no such power. The agency that suggested them would have the exclusive power. In other words, the farmer says, "This man is my agent, you name him and clothe him with this authority, he is my agent, though he is not your servant." If the language we seek goes into the bill, he remains the agent of the farmer.

Mr. SWANSON. Appointed by him and removed by him?

Mr. CARAWAY. And responsive to him.

Mr. SWANSON. And responsive to him.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is it.

Mr. SWANSON. And it is not in violation of the Constitution under the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. CARAWAY. Absolutely not.

Mr. SWANSON. In which they say Congress can give other agencies the power to make appointments and the President can not remove them. Is that the Senator's contention?

Mr. CARAWAY. That is it.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. As I understand the Senator, then, if this advisory council should delay the equalization fee, the farmers themselves being the creators of the council, it would be the agent of the farmers, and would be responsive to their wishes.

Mr. CARAWAY. They would be responsive to the farmer. They are just his hired men.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I understood the Senator to say that this advisory council would have the power to obstruct or change the policy fixed.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. PITTMAN. Where do we find the provision as to that?

Mr. CARAWAY. That is in the amendment pending.

Mr. PITTMAN. It is not in the bill now?

Mr. CARAWAY. No. The only question now is how we shall select the advisory council, and of whom it shall be. The advisory council shall say when the board shall commence marketing operations, and when it shall terminate them, but I think we have to put this language into the bill to meet the objections of the President.

We are preparing to deal, wisely or unwisely, by the vote we are to take shortly, with the hopes and aspirations of at least 30,000,000 people. I do believe that since we have determined to do this, Senators ought to find out exactly what they are passing upon when they cast their votes. It is not the ordinary bill; it is a vital matter.

This other amendment must go in, I take it, if we want to escape the President's veto. Among the things he complained of in his veto was the attempt of Congress to limit the agencies that he should select; that is, the board. He said that was an encroachment upon his constitutional right to make appointments, and that he would not permit Congress to infringe that right. This amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee leads right back to that controversy. It undertakes to restrict the President in his right, although its supporters say that we merely suggest. But if he wants to veto the measure—and we have been assured by the Senator from Ohio that he does—that affords him a pretext; I will not say a reason, because it is not a reason, but one who seeks a pretext can find it.

We surrendered much in the mechanism of this bill to keep away from a conflict with the Chief Executive upon certain matters that were not entirely conclusive as to the merits of the bill. We yielded in order to meet some superficial objections he made. It was suggested that this amendment go in. Where we give the veto power, there must be some reason for the exercise of that veto power, there must be something to show it was not just a whim. Therefore it is suggested that this language go into the bill:

> No marketing period under section 7 in respect of any agricultural commodity shall be commenced or terminated unless the advisory council for such commodity concurs in the respective finding or findings which the board is required to make prior to the commencement or termination of the marketing period.

It will be seen that the advisory council then becomes rather a court of review. It meets the President's objection that under the other bill the advisory council might veto the board's act out of mere caprice, out of whim, out of desire to be contrary. This says that their right is merely a right of review. They must find the facts as they are, not as the board says they are. If they find the facts different, they can veto the act of the board. It goes a little further than that, and I must say that is what every Senator will want to put in it, and this is the language we suggest to take its place:

> No equalization fee shall be collected unless the estimates upon which the determination of the amount of the equalization fee is based are concurred in by the advisory council for that commodity.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is that an amendment which the Senator from Arkansas is offering?

Mr. CARAWAY. We are offering this as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee; yes. I presume it is not worth while to discuss it, although the very vitals of the bill are tied up in these amendments.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think it is exceedingly important that we discuss it. In my opinion, these two amendments go to the very heart of the bill.

Mr. CARAWAY. They are the bill itself. If the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee prevails without change, we might as well tear the bill in two, because it will be made impossible of successful administration. We would be denying to the farmers, whose rights are being invaded by this bill, what little right remains to them of being the masters of the instrumentalities that are to deal with the marketing of their products. If Congress can not trust the farmers, if they have neither the intelligence nor the character that would warrant Congress in letting them be the controllers of the products of their own toil, then adopt the McKellar amendment and say to them—because that is what it does—"We have not only lost faith in your power to know when and how you should sell your products, but we do not believe you have intelligence enough to name your own agents. We are going to appoint a guardian for you and deny you the right to say when you shall sell or how you shall sell, or what instrumentality shall be your agent in selling."

That is tied up in this amendment. Let us be absolutely clear about it. There is no reason why the Members of the Senate, all men who have had experience, and all, saving myself, at least, people of high intelligence, should confuse language. However you may make it read in order to soothe somebody's prejudice, the thing is not to be adopted for a day; it is to become a policy, and the truth in the matter must come out.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand the Senator, he is offering an amendment to the McKellar amendment?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Which one of the McKellar amendments?

Mr. CARAWAY. It is the amendment which commences on line 10.

Mr. BORAH. Section 4?

Mr. CARAWAY. I will give it to the Senator, because I do hope that Senators will read the provision.

Mr. BORAH. "No marketing period shall be begun or terminated," and so on?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes. It commences on line 13, page 2 of the amendment, the first part of it, "the advisory council shall be composed of seven members, to be appointed by the President." We hope to strike out "to be appointed by the President" and provide that it shall be named by the board. Then, when we come down to the marketing provision; that is, on page 3——

Mr. HARRIS. Not only named by the board, but suggested by the farmers' organizations.

Mr. CARAWAY. Named by the board, and from lists which the farmers themselves submit; so that they will get the exact agents they want.

We want to strike out the provision as to their term of office, so that they shall simply sit there as the agents of the farmers, and whenever they cease to be their agents they shall cease to hold office, just as when you hire a man in the conduct of your business. You would not hire a man to be your bookkeeper for 10 years, without any power of removing him although he might destroy your business within that time and force you into bankruptcy. You would say, "I will employ you as long as you fulfill the duties of this office satisfactorily to me."

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. SHEPPARD. If the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas should be adopted, and if the advisory council appointed by the board at the direction of the farmers should prove to be unsatisfactory, how would the farmers proceed in order to remove the board or any of its recalcitrant members?

Mr. CARAWAY. I am perfectly willing, if the Senator thinks the language is not clear, to provide that the agents may be removed upon the advice of the farm organizations. I take it, however, to be axiomatic, that if they name them, and they have no term of office, the minute the farmers are displeased with them, they being their agents, they can replace them by others. But if there is any doubt about it, I should like to have it cleared up.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. CARAWAY. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think this is a very important matter.

Mr. CARAWAY. It is the heart of the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. I would like to have the Senator turn to the page and line where he wants language stricken out of the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me read just how we would make the amendment read. Commencing on line 13, page 2, we would make it read this way:

The advisory council shall be composed of seven members to be appointed by the board.

That would be the language.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Is it not necessary for the Senator to take in the preceding sentence also, "The President shall thereupon create an advisory council," and so on?

Mr. CARAWAY. I am proposing to strike all that out.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator referred to line 13.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought the Senator from Florida wanted me to state how the amendment would read as we are proposing to amend it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I want to know what the Senator proposes to strike out.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, may I ask if the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas is not to be proposed as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CARAWAY. It is.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Has the Senator from Florida before him the McKellar amendment?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. He was asking me about that.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was asking what the Senator proposes to strike out of the McKellar amendment, and then insert.

Mr. CARAWAY. I would strike out commencing on line 10, page 2 of the McKellar amendment as printed, the following:

Then the board shall notify the President of such determination or application. The President shall thereupon create an advisory council for the commodity. The advisory council shall be composed of seven members, etc.

I would strike out all that language and simply say:

There shall be an advisory council composed of seven members appointed by the board from a list submitted by cooperative associations or other organizations representative of the producers of the commodity.

That would be the amendment I would want to have adopted.

Mr. President, there is just one more feature I want to discuss briefly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I might mention, if the Senator will allow me, that some objection might be raised to that suggestion because some of the cooperative associations have not been successful. They have broken down and, in a way, gone to pieces. Whether they would be recognized as proper agencies for representing agriculture is a question.

Mr. CARAWAY. But the language is "by cooperative associations or other organizations representative of the producers of the commodities."

Mr. FLETCHER. That might cover it.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is the language of the proposed amendment.

Mr. SMITH. Would the word "or" be better or would it be better to have the word "and" than the word "or"?

Mr. CARAWAY. If we say "cooperative and other organizations," it presupposes that there are other organizations than cooperative associations, and if there were not I do not see how we could name them as cooperative associations, because it says "cooperative and other associations." If we say "or" that would mean that it is the duty to recognize every association which represents any appreciable part of the producing commodity.

Mr. SMITH. I recognize the object of the bill entirely, and it is a proper one, to be to promote cooperation, and therefore any farm organization should be given preference.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is true. May I say again, and then I shall take my seat, that we conclude the amendment by striking out the language arbitrarily providing that the board shall not commence or continue a marketing operation without the consent of a majority of the advisory council. I presume there will be no serious contention that the language last proposed ought to supplant that provision, because nobody would want to have a capricious commencing or a capricious termination of this thing. There ought to be some reason for commencing a marketing operation and some reason for quitting the same.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator approves of that amendment?

Mr. CARAWAY. I think that ought to go in. I know that it meets a part of the objection the President made to the provisions of the other bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I discussed somewhat at length on yesterday with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] several of these points. I had hoped that we would take up the amendments seriatim and that the discussion with respect to each amendment would be had at the time it was pending before the Senate, instead of having a general discussion such as we have had from the Senator from Arkansas this morning. I think that would have been the more orderly way. Of course, I do not mean to say that there is not weight in some of the suggestions and some of the amendments proposed by the Senator from Arkansas. For one, I shall be very glad, when the amendments are reached, to give due consideration to any suggestions that he may make with reference to a change in the amendments proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

It is suggested with reference to those amendments that they are framed with a view to taking out of the hands of the farmers of the country the control of their business, that they are based upon the idea that the farmers of the country are not sufficiently intelligent to attend to their business, and that they do not know what they need nor what they want. That is the suggestion made by the Senator from Arkansas with reference to the so-called McKellar amendments. Of course, such suggestions are very wide of the mark.

I wish the Senate would give me its attention when I say that the several amendments presented by the Senator from Tennessee are not amendments which he himself has drawn, but are amendments which have been worked out by quite a number of the Senators who represent the larger cotton-growing States of the Union.

I would like to add to that, Mr. President, the further statement that those amendments have been submitted to the representatives of the farmers' cooperative associations and farm organizations, who are here in Washington and who have been instrumental in securing action by the committee upon this great scheme, whose labors have been incessant, not only during this session but during the last session. They are here, charged with the performance of a duty intrusted to them by the farmers whom they claim to represent, and we have consulted them. As I am advised, every one of the representatives of those organizations has agreed to the amendments which were prepared by the Senators who thought they were representing the interests of the cotton farmers of the country.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am very much interested in the segregation of the amendments——

Mr. SIMMONS. I am going to discuss that later. I am answering now a general charge that the committee which prepared the amendments have sacrificed the interests of the farmer, betrayed the interests of the farmer, and are trying to put upon them something that they do not want, and that the committee has proceeded upon the theory that the farmers have not sufficient intelligence to know what they want.

Mr. PITTMAN. What I am trying to get at is this: Here is an amendment which I hold in my hand——

Mr. SIMMONS. Will not the Senator allow me to discuss that when we get to it?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes. But, of course, I want to know what the Senator is discussing.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall be very glad to enlighten the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. I understand the general principles which the Senator is about to discuss, but I do not know whether he is with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], or whether the Senator from Arkansas is with the Senator from North Carolina, unless I know what amendments he is discussing.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator is sufficiently versed in the methods of discussion to know that before I enter into the discussion of a thing in detail I would like to discuss some of the general propositions which are alleged against the whole scheme, especially as to the motives of those who have proposed the measure. That is all I was undertaking to do for the present. When I reach the particular amendment, I shall be pleased to discuss anything the Senator may suggest with reference to it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Both the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Arkansas have been talking about "amendments." There is apparently one amendment called the McKellar amendment. There is another amendment called the Caraway amendment. I do not know which one the Senator from North Carolina is discussing.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have just explained, in language as specific as I am capable of uttering with respect to any simple matter, that the amendments presented by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] and spoken of as the McKellar amendments—not one, but a dozen or more—were not prepared altogether by the Senator from Tennessee, but that they were prepared by a voluntary committee of Senators representing the cotton States, who desire that the bill shall be so written as to promote the cotton industry as well as the agricultural industry generally, so that they can consistently support the bill. I regret that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] has not succeeded in understanding me.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I suggest that the Senator from Nevada is confused because he looks upon the McKellar amendments as one amendment? They are all amendments to a particular part of the bill, and the particular part of the bill which each amendment proposes to amend is noted at the beginning of each paragraph. These are all separate amendments according to the paragraphs, and they show what part of the bill they are intended to amend.

Mr. SHEPPARD. And they were all offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

Mr. SIMMONS. Exactly; but I have just stated that they were not drafted by him. They were drafted by a committee of Senators.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I said they were presented to the Senate by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], and they are known as the McKellar amendments.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. I think the Senator was not here when I so stated.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think that the Senator is now discussing the amendments which are printed in the form now before us known as the McKellar amendments, and that is all that he is discussing.

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly; and in that connection I purpose to discuss some observations of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] with reference to the bill at large and also with reference to some of the amendments.

Mr. PITTMAN. Now, the Senator from Arkansas proposes to amend the McKellar amendment?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; the McKellar amendments.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is what I understood. He proposes an amendment to the McKellar amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; as I have just stated.

Mr. PITTMAN. So when the Senator from North Carolina refers to "amendments" he is referring to the printed form of the McKellar amendments at the present time, and not the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course, I will try to distinguish the McKellar amendments from the Caraway amendments when I come to them. I am not at this time, however, disposed to enter into any detailed discussion of the amendments. As I stated, I think it would be very much better for us to discuss the amendments as they are offered. There are probably 15 or 20 amendments proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] and probably 4 or 5 amendments proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY].

Mr. CARAWAY. They have been offered now, may I say to the Senator, and we were about ready to vote on them.

Mr. SIMMONS. We are not going to vote on them en bloc?

Mr. CARAWAY. No.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what I meant. They should be voted on separately, and therefore I think, as they deal with separate propositions, it would be better to discuss them when we reach the individual amendments.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator will find, when he reads them, that they are so interwoven and engrafted one upon the other that they must all stand or fall together, because while they are offered as three separate amendments they deal exactly with the same subject and are so linked together that we can not discuss one without discussing them all.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was going to discuss such of the amendments as the Senator from Arkansas discussed, or a part of the amendments which I think probably need further discussion. But I was prefacing my discussion with the general statement that if it were true that the amendments presented by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] do not correctly interpret the best interests of the farmers of the country, then not only the Senator from Tennessee, but a great many other Senators, who represent the cotton States especially, do not understand their needs either. Certainly it would not be charged that they were deliberately betraying the interests which they represent or which they should represent upon this floor.

Further answering the suggestions of the Senator that the farmers are by these amendments left hopeless and without protection by the provisions of the McKellar amendments, the fact is that these amendments have been submitted to representatives of the farmers' organizations who are here to-day and have been here since the inception of this legislation at this session, as most of them were here when it was under consideration at previous sessions, and who claim the right to represent and to speak for the farmers. They have agreed to the amendments of the Senator from Tennessee, without indicating that such amendments would in any way be a betrayal of the interests of the farmers whom they represent.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me for a minute?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, I yield; but I did not interrupt the Senator. I do not, however, object to his interrupting me at all.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, no; I will not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. Of course, the Senator is translating into my speech the word "betrayal," whatever construction he puts on it, and I am not going to complain about that; but I rose for the purpose of saying that the farm organization leaders who are here discussed the matter with me; they thought they had to yield on that point in order to get certain votes. It did not meet their approval, but they thought it was a question of expediency. There were some of those leaders in my office this morning.

Mr. SIMMONS. I myself have not heard anything of that sort, and I know nothing about it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me?

Mr. CARAWAY. And they hope that it may be washed out in the conference. That is the history of the matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Arkansas, who mentioned that matter to me on yesterday, that representatives of the organizations came to see me this morning, and I said, "Look here, what do you gentlemen mean? You told Senator CARAWAY that you were rather compelled to enter into the agreement to support these amendments." Well, they then asserted vigorously that the amendments met their approval. So there we are. They came to see me this morning, and they told me what I have stated.

Mr. CARAWAY. I will tell the Senator from Tennessee what we can do. We can go out and have a conference with them all together, and settle in that way the question in regard to what they want.

Mr. HEFLIN. I suggest a written statement be sent in here and read to the Senate.

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not think that is necessary.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have not heard any suggestion of that kind referred to by the Senator from Arkansas coming from these gentlemen. I have this to say about it, though. If they have told us that these amendments were satisfactory to them, when they were not satisfactory to them, when they thought they betrayed the interest of the farmer whom they represent, then they are not the kind of men that I have taken them to be. That is all I have to say about it.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator from North Carolina will permit an observation at this point, I desire to say that if the men who represent, or claim to represent, the farm organizations are guilty of what seems to have transpired, we have not thrown sufficient safeguards around the proposed law. It is claimed that they want to represent the best interests of the farmer, but I submit that the best interests of the farmer can not be represented by that kind of action on the part of those who claim to represent him.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, one of the contentions of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] is that the farmers will have more protection under the bill as it is reported by the committee than they will have under the bill if amended as provided by the amendments submitted by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], especially with reference to the authority and power vested in the council appointed to represent any particular commodity that may come under the proposed law. There is not the slightest foundation for that contention. On the contrary, the farmers will have infinitely less protection under the bill as it came from the committee than they would have under the amendments of the Senator from Tennessee. The effect of the amendments submitted by the Senator from Arkansas would be simply to revert to the action of the committee. The Senator from Arkansas is a member of the committee which reported the bill, and he now proposes to amend the amendments of the Senator from Tennessee so as practically to restore the provisions of the bill as it came from the committee. Those provisions were unsatisfactory to certain southern Senators especially, and unsatisfactory because, and only because—and I ask Senators to bear that in mind—first, the council as provided in the Senate committee bill would have no power except advisory power. It would be appointed by the board which would be appointed by the President, and it would be responsible solely to that board for its action, its action being in the main simply advisory. This would inevitably make the council absolutely subservient to the board.

We did not think it would be fair to the farmer that his product, cotton, I will say, for illustration, the chief crop of 11 great States of the Union, should be brought into this bill under the supposed protection of a special advisory council to represent that interest when that advisory council would have nothing but purely recommendatory and advisory powers and when it would be absolutely subservient to the will of the board.

How is the board which the Senator from Arkansas says should appoint the advisory council and under which the advisory council would have no independent powers of its own to be appointed? Here is the provision in regard to the appointment of that board; I wish to read it to the Senate:

SEC. 2. (a) A Federal farm board is hereby created which shall consist of the Secretary of Agriculture, who shall be a member ex officio, and 12 members, 1 from each of the 12 Federal land-bank districts, who shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

That is the way that board is to be created.

Mr. SMITH. Are there no qualifications?

Mr. SIMMONS. None that I can see. The bill reads:

(b) The terms of office of the appointed members of the board first taking office after the approval of this act shall expire as designated by the President at the time of nomination—

And so on.

A successor to an appointed member of the board shall be appointed in the same manner as the original appointed members, and shall have a term of office expiring six years from the date of the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed.

(c) Any person appointed to fill a vacancy in the board occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed shall be appointed for the remainder of such term.

(d) Any member of the board in office at the expiration of the term for which he was appointed may continue in office until his successor takes office.

I am trying to find the provision as to qualifications, and ask the Senator to find it if he can.

Mr. McKELLAR. To what does the Senator refer?

Mr. SMITH. To the qualifications of the members of the board.

Mr. SIMMONS. Here it is; I have found it.

(f) Each of the appointed members of the board shall be a citizen of the United States, shall not actively engage in any other business, vocation, or employment than that of serving as a member of the board—

It is said that we can not restrict the rights of the President, but here is a restriction in the bill itself—and shall receive a salary of $10,000 a year, together with necessary traveling expenses and expenses incurred for subsistence or per diem allowance in lieu thereof, within the limitations prescribed by law while away from the principal office of the board—

I need not read further.

Then it proceeds to set forth the general powers of the board. I see no substantial and special qualifications there prescribed and required for members of the board.

Mr. SMITH. The only qualifications seem to be that a member of the board shall be a citizen of the United States, that each member of the board shall be representative of one of the land-bank districts, and that each member shall disassociate himself from any other business that he may have been engaged in and restrict his activities entirely to the functions of the board. Then the vacancies occurring in the board shall be filled according to the terms of the original appointments.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me ask the Senator from Oregon, in order to get this matter straight, if, under the bill as reported by him, there is any limitation upon the President's power of appointment except as to citizenship and except as to the member so appointed giving his full time to the duties of the office and not being engaged in any other business?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the President is given the untrammeled right to make the appointments subject to the limitations expressed by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Exactly. The board is thus constituted with no limitations. The farmer has nothing to do with its appointment at all. There are 12 members of the board, and the Secretary of Agriculture makes 13. The advisory council for which the bill provides, and in respect of which the Senator from Arkansas wants to so amend the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee that the provision shall practically remain as it was written, is to be appointed by this board.

It is true that a limitation is placed upon the appointment of the members of the advisory council.

Mr. BORAH. The only limitation is that they shall be appointed from a list submitted by cooperative associations and other organizations representative of the producers of the commodity.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; they are authorized and directed to create a body appointed in that way, the members of which shall serve without salary, and so forth. That is their limitation. They are required, authorized, and directed to do that; but if they shall fail to do that, if they shall disregard that direction, what remedy has the farmer? What can he do in case the board appoints some one contrary to that requirement?

Mr. BORAH. He can do the same thing that he can under the bill generally, and that is nothing.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is nothing. That is what I say. But even if the farmer had some way of getting rid of the board in case they did not appoint the man the farmers recommended, even if that were true, this advisory council as the bill is written has no independence of thought and of action. It has only the power to advise and it is the creature of the board. Now, we wanted to remedy those two defects especially.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, as I understand the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, this advisory council is to be composed of farmers, and if the matter under consideration is cotton some of them have to come from the Cotton Belt, and if it is grain they have to come from the Grain Belt; and a list is furnished the President from which they would be glad to have him select the advisory council.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; that is true under the McKellar amendments. If the President is given the power to appoint, he will not be compelled, of course—we can not compel him—to appoint; but we can direct in the law that he shall appoint from a certain section; that he shall appoint persons engaged in a certain line of business pertinent to the measure under consideration. We did that in the Federal reserve act; we did that in the flood relief act; we have done that in 25 or 30 acts of the past several years.

Mr. HEFLIN. But if he did not appoint the people that we thought ought to be appointed, we could reject the appointments here.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is exactly what I was going to get to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves the proposition he has just mentioned, it was said that if the board appointed these members the farmers themselves would virtually appoint them.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am going to get to that, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. McKELLAR. I just want to call the Senator's attention to this fact: For instance, take Tennessee, as an illustration. We have several farm organizations down there, independent ones, and the board would select whichever one they wanted to select, and the farmer would really not select the members.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was going to get to that. Let me get to the matter of President's appointments.

The President is circumscribed here only by a direction of Congress such as we have put in other bills—that is, that he shall appoint from certain industries, shall appoint somebody and only somebody who is engaged in the production of commodity concerned, and that he shall consider in connection with those appointments the list that is presented to him by farmers' organizations, cooperative or otherwise—that is, that he shall get the best recommendations that he can through the cooperation of the farmers in making that selection. If the President does not see fit to obey the law in that respect, we have no way to coerce him about it, but we can reject his nominations; but, on the other hand, if the board does exactly the same thing, we are without power to coerce the board or stop its action. There is, however, this broad difference in the two propositions:

If the board appoints persons that are not interested in the industry, persons that are not satisfactory to the farmers, then the farmer has no remedy. He must submit to the board; and the board, being so interested in controlling the matter, are likely to select members for the council that they can best control in the exercise even of the council's limited advisory power.

Mr. President, all of this talk about the recommendations of the farmers applies especially to the appointments made by the board. The board is not required in the committee bill to do any more than select from the industry, and select a representative; but, once a selection is made, whether it conforms to the law or not, there is no way to remove him from power.

There is no check upon their action. The power is unlimited, uncircumscribed. If, however, we have the members of the council appointed by the President, and if the President shall disregard the limitations that we have imposed, if he shall refuse to appoint a person who is a producer or from a list recommended to him by a farm organization or a number of farm organizations, under the McKellar amendment the Senate has the right of confirmation or rejection, and in the exercise of that veto power we can restrain the action of the President. I do not think it would often be necessary, but it might occasionally be necessary, and when necessary it would be extremely important. Therefore, as a wise precaution, we have insisted upon placing this power in the hands of the Senate by prescribing that the members of the council shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. President, Senators talk about the board or the President, either, acting upon the recommendations of these cooperative associations and farmers' organizations. With respect to a great industry that does not mean anything, practically, or mighty little. In each State, probably, there is a cooperative association. There may be, as in the case of cotton, 10 or 11 States that are interested in the production of cotton to a large extent. They may each have several separate organizations, farmers' organizations, cooperative organizations; they may have representatives here at the Capitol claiming to speak for them; but I think the Members of the Senate know without any discussion of that question on my part that very frequently the alleged representatives of these organizations at the Capitol do not speak what represents the sentiment of the farmer or his interests.

Where there probably might be a dozen lists from which selections might be made, it would be difficult for the President and it would be difficult for the board to determine whose recommendation he should follow. There is, however, one provision in the amendment sponsored by the committee of which the Senator from Tennessee is the spokesman, and which is embraced in his amendment, that is a safeguard that can not be disregarded, and it is a safeguard that is easy of application; and that is that the appointee on this advisory council, whoever he may be, whoever may recommend him or whoever may oppose him, shall be a producer of that product. "A producer" means a bona fide farmer. That was put in there because we did not see how it would be possible to evade that. Surely the President of the United States can not say that Congress has not the right to say that in appointing an advisory board to represent the interests of cotton, for instance, its members shall be selected from the producers of cotton. Surely that is not a limitation upon his authority of which he can complain. If it is, then I assert that a similar limitation is written in at least a hundred statutes, and no question has ever been made about it; but it is a limitation so broad and sweeping and comprehensive that the President can not disregard it without invoking the immediate wrath of the Senate in the form of a rejection of his nominee.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] insists that this whole business shall be put in the hands of the cooperatives and the farmers, and he insists that the bill as it came from the House practically does that. The bill as it came from the House does no such thing. The bill as it came from the House simply permits them to recommend to a board whose powers are unlimited in dealing with the provisions of this bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will ask the Senator to pardon me a moment. Furthermore, Mr. President, there are some sections of the country that do not think these organizations always represent the sentiments or the interests of the farmer, and where, in fact, the farmers are not truly and adequately represented by any farmers' organization.

I know of one particular State—I shall not designate it—where there is but one farm organization, and I am sure there are not 5 per cent of the farmers of that State members of that organization. I know that they had a tri-State tobacco cooperative association there, and it functioned for five years and then went into bankruptcy, and the farmers of those three States have lost tens of millions of dollars. It has gone out of existence. There is a cotton organization there, but not 10 per cent of the cotton farmers of the State belong to it.

The Senator says we will coerce the farmers to join these cooperative associations, and when we have coerced them all to join, then we will give them the right to recommend to this board whom they shall appoint as their advisory council to represent them, when the Senator knows that if that board disregards that recommendation, even if that consummation of organizations should be accomplished and all the farmers in the cotton States should become members of this cooperative association, even then they could disregard it, and the farmer would have no remedy. On the other hand, under the bill we have adopted, if the President disregards the recommendations of these organizations which exist or may come into existence, and makes an independent appointment contrary to the provisions and spirit of this law, and not truly representative, we have that provision in the law that "We directed you to appoint regardless of this list. We directed you in broad, general, sweeping, comprehensive terms to appoint nobody except some one who was a producer, and you have appointed a person who is not a producer"; and we have the power in the Senate to say no to his nomination. That is a real safeguard that can be invoked and that will be effective.

It will hardly be contended, I think, that the Senate as a whole does not fairly represent the agricultural interests of this country, does not sympathize with the agricultural interests, does not understand fairly the needs of the agricultural interests of the United States, and does not genuinely desire to conform its action to their best interests. That will hardly be contended. It will certainly not be contended that the Senators who represent the cotton States are not in sympathy with the cotton grower, because in many of those States we have the one-crop system. Practically the only money crop we produce in certain southern States is cotton.

We neglect to produce those things which are necessary to sustain the life of man or the life of the animals he employs, and we buy those things from other sections of the country, because we once thought it was more profitable to raise cotton and to buy those other things. We are distinctively a one-crop section in many of the States of the South. My State has broken loose somewhat from that, as has the State of the Senator from South Carolina. Both of those States are not only agricultural but they have become great manufacturing States; but cotton and tobacco are the chief agricultural products of both. The balance of the Southern States are principally cotton-growing States.

Can it be thought that the President will disregard our wishes and the spirit of the law in this matter in the appointment of a person to represent the cotton industry of the South on this advisory council, which has in its hands the life or death of this industry, this advisory council which will, if the machinery of this bill be put into operation, have enormous power? We would like to safeguard all that, and we can do so under the bill with the McKellar amendments. The council will have a large voice in the control of the cotton situation, and under the bill as reported by the committee it would be only the voice of advice, the voice of recommendation. The members would be merely the puppets of a board, and a board that is absolutely free and independent of everybody from the time it is appointed until its term expires, unless the President, who appoints it and selects it, should see fit to remove one or more of the members of the board.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, as the Senator is developing——

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH. I just want to ask a question.

Mr. President, as the Senator is developing the idea of how far we may go in directing the President, or attempting to limit him in the power of appointment granted him under the Constitution, we have certain bipartisan boards appointed under provisions we have written into the law providing for boards to be composed of equal representation, or practically equal representation, from the two different parties. As far as I know, in my experience in the Senate, I have not known the President to depart from the observance of such a provision of law.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, one other thing, and I am through. Everybody knows that the one stumbling block in connection with this whole bill is what is known as the equalization fee. That is a provision by which the farmer undertakes, contrary to what is required of the other industries of this country, to take care out of his own pocket of any loss that shall be sustained in an effort to raise and support the price of his product.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator pardon me until I get through with this phase of the matter?

The power of imposing this equalization fee is an exceedingly great power. The act itself does not impose it. The act itself expressly provides that it shall be imposed under certain circumstances and conditions.

Mr. SMITH. By the board.

Mr. SIMMONS. By the board. It does not direct that it may be imposed by the advisory council, selected to represent that particular interest to be brought in and subjected to this equalization-fee burden. It vests that power in the board, and that board, appointed by the President, with no limitations upon its power, with nothing to restrain its hand, has the sole and exclusive power of bringing any industry in this country under the operation of this measure and imposing upon it not only an equalization fee, but the board practically has the power and the right to fix the amount of the equalization fee.

Mr. President, Senators representing the cotton States are probably more interested in this bill than those representing the wheat States, because this is a bill to take care of surpluses, and the cotton industry in a year exports more in value than the value of all the other agricultural exports from this country combined. It is proposed to go in under this bill and by an equalization fee provide for the losses in withdrawing from the market, if the conditions require it, six or eight million bales of cotton a year; and, naturally, we who represent the South want to know who is going to impose that equalization fee and fix the amount of that equalization fee.

The Senator from Arkansas would have the board do it all. We say "no." We have gone into this thing because you have given us an advisory council to represent our product as distinguished from every other product in the United States, and we want that advisory council to have the authority and the power to veto any equalization fee that may be proposed, the amount of it, and whether it shall be applied at all or not.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I understand that this advisory council would have to approve the recommendations of the board, or they can veto them before they can put into effect the equalization fee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. HARRIS. Under the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas would not this board be able to do the same thing?

Mr. SIMMONS. Not as I understand it. When we get to that, if the Senator from Arkansas has an amendment that would confer upon the board the same power our amendment would confer, though he may use different language to do it, we will make no objection. I do not care anything about the phraseology, but I want the advisory council, selected to represent this great interest, and not the board, to have the right of controlling the imposition of the equalization fee.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the amendment which the Senator from Arkansas has shown me, which is to be on page 7, after line 11, and which is relevant to this discussion, reads as follows:

> No marketing period under section 7 in respect of any agricultural commodity shall be commenced or terminated unless the advisory council for such commodity concurs in the respective finding or findings which the board is required to make prior to the commencement or termination of the marketing period. No equalization fee shall be collected unless the estimates upon which the determination of the amount of the equalization fee is based are concurred in by the advisory council for the commodity.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, so far as that amendment is concerned, it differs to some extent from the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, but I do not think it very substantially differs from it. In one respect the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas is different from the bill. What I favor is an amendment that will accomplish this very purpose, either by the language used by the Senator from Arkansas, or the language used in the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BORAH. I think this amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas is an exceedingly important amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator think it would strengthen the powers of the council?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. If it would strengthen the powers of the council, then I will accept it, so far as I am concerned. I want to strengthen their powers.

Mr. BORAH. I quite agree with the Senator. I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas is one of the most important amendments offered to the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not fighting the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas. I was controverting some of the arguments of the Senator from Arkansas especially with reference to the appointment of the council. Incidentally, I did not know that his amendment was quite as sweeping as it would seem to be. I had thought it covered not quite as broadly as the McKellar amendment does the question of the equalization fee, when it shall be imposed, what the amount shall be, and when it shall be withdrawn or discontinued. When we get to that amendment I shall be very glad to discuss it further. I was speaking of the general principles. I want a safeguard of that kind. It is needed in the bill. It is in the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee. If the Senator from Arkansas has an amendment which accomplishes the same purpose and goes a little further, I would be perfectly willing to accept it, but I would want to examine it for myself before committing myself to it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senator from Idaho, on page 3 of the amendments offered by me, lines 6 to 14, inclusive, are intended to be substantially the same as the Caraway amendment. So far as I am concerned, if the language would suit the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Idaho better, I see no reason to think that it is not equally as good as the language in my amendment. I think it means exactly the same thing.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Idaho thinks it is stronger.

Mr. McKELLAR. If it is stronger, let us have it.

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt that the objective of the Senator from Tennessee is the same as that of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McKELLAR. Precisely.

Mr. BORAH. But I think there is a concluding sentence in the Caraway amendment which is exceptionally important and I do not find it in the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, although I find in all probability the intent to arrive there. That sentence reads:

> No equalization fee shall be collected unless the estimates, upon which the determination of the amount of the equalization fee is based, are concurred in by the advisory council for the commodity.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Idaho will understand that when I was discussing the equalization fee and its application under the machinery of the bill, I was proceeding upon the fact that under the committee bill the authority of the advisory council thereby conferred was negative and ineffective, and that the amendments proposed by the Senator from Tennessee were intended to correct that situation and change their authority from that of negative action to that of affirmative action in disapproval or approval. I regard that as fundamental.

Mr. BORAH. I regard it as fundamental, too. I quite agree with the Senator. The Senator is desirous of making the advisory council somewhat an independent tribunal.

Mr. SIMMONS. Exactly.

Mr. BORAH. Then he refers to the powers of the advisory council after it has been created. The Senator from Tennessee offers certain amendments giving certain powers with reference to the board, but in my opinion there is one sentence in the Caraway amendment which we ought to have.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say that I agree with the Senator from Idaho. I think it is better in the way the Senator mentions, and so far as I can now do so, I ask unanimous consent to strike out, on page 3 of my amendment, lines 6 to 14, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the language proposed by the Senator from Arkansas in that regard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator may modify his amendment without unanimous consent.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to say that so far as I am concerned I am contending for certain fundamental things in connection with this matter. The first is that the advisory council shall be an independent board. The second is that one of the functions of the advisory council shall be the power to negative any action of the board with reference to the bringing in of agricultural product and the imposition of an equalization fee upon that product, and the amount of the equalization fee. Those principles I consider absolutely fundamental. If those fundamental principles are preserved, I do not care whose amendment is adopted. But I am opposed to any amendment that would emasculate or weaken the powers of the advisory council as they are fixed by the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee. The bill as reported by the committee would leave the council a purely negative body with nothing but advisory powers, subject to the control and removal by the board at all times, and, therefore, the caprice of a board appointed by the President without any limitation upon the power of appointment except citizenship and place of residence.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I endeavored to interrupt the Senator from North Carolina, but he saw fit not to permit me to do so.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; the Senator need not think that I refrained from answering his question. I never have done that during my service in the Senate and I hope I never will.

Mr. BRUCE. If the Senator had permitted me to interrupt him, I would have said all I intended to say, I think, within the time allowed for the interruption. I wish to say just a word with reference to the importance which the Senator from North Carolina attaches to the equalization fee provided for in the pending bill. In my opinion there is no distinction in some respects to be taken between the provisions of the bill relating to loans and advances made out of the revolving fund provided for by it, and the fund created by the equalization fee. That fee is really not a burden upon the farmer. It is a burden upon the consumer.

Mr. BORAH. Not necessarily.

Mr. BRUCE. I do not agree with the Senator. I think it is necessarily a burden upon the consumer.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think the Senator——

Mr. BRUCE. Just a moment, if the Senator please.

Mr. SIMMONS. I thought the Senator asked me a question.

Mr. BRUCE. No.

Mr. SIMMONS. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BRUCE. I say that while the equalization fee is supposed to be collected from the farmer, for all practical purposes it is not collected from him at all. It is collected from the consumer. The only difference between the result when such a fee is collected and the result when a loan or an advance is made out of the revolving fund is that in the latter case the loan or advance comes out of the General Treasury of the Federal Government and not out of the pocket of the consumer. That is the whole difference.

The equalization fee, with due respect to the authors of the pending bill, is nothing but a blown-up bladder. The bill is an artificial thing from beginning to end. For the first time, almost, in the history of the human race, the general prosperity is to be promoted not by creating abundance, not by producing wealth, but by creating a dearth.

The power is given to the board to inflate prices with its bellows whenever it deems it discreet to do so under the provisions of the bill, and when it enters upon this process of inflation there is no reason why it should not push it not only to the point of providing what may be deemed by it to be a proper price to the farmer for his commodity but to a point sufficient to cover the equalization fee besides. It is not true that the farmer pays the equalization fee under the provisions of the bill. He is allowed what is supposed to be a proper price for his commodity, and if this amount is enhanced to a sufficient additional extent to cover the equalization fee, what difference does that make to him? But it makes a world of difference to the consumer, because it is he who has to pay the price deemed the proper price for the commodity sold by the farmer plus the amount of the equalization fee.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRUCE. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. It has been estimated that the consumers last year paid about $29,000,000,000 for what the farmers of the country produced, and out of that the farmers got about $9,000,000,000. The rest of it went to somebody who was operating between the farmer and the man who got the food. It might be possible that this measure would have some effect upon that gentleman, and if it did it would be a good thing.

Mr. BRUCE. That is a different question altogether—the question as to how far the spread between the farmer and the consumer under existing conditions is too great.

Mr. BORAH. It is not a different question, for the reason that the basic principle of the bill is intelligent marketing to enable the farmers to intelligently market their produce so they will get what the produce is worth and not be robbed on the way from the farm to the consumer.

Mr. BRUCE. It seems to me that the basic idea of the bill is unnaturally to inflate prices by buying up the exportable surplus of an agricultural commodity and creating a domestic scarcity in it; that is to say, artificially to tumefy the domestic price for an agricultural product to such an extent as not only to give the farmer an adequate price, but, where the equalization fee will come into play, to provide for that fee also. That consideration, so far as I know, has never received attention in the course of the discussion of the pending bill, but I believe it to be an absolutely sound one. Of course, if the equalization fee is really a burden on the farmer, then it is an absolutely unconstitutional and unlawful one, because it is entirely beyond the power of the Federal Government to say to me, if I am a farmer, when I come to sell some product of my farm, that I must submit to a deduction from the price whether I am willing to do so or not.

Such an imposition is either a tax or it is an attempt to take my property from me without due process of law contrary to the guaranties of the Federal Constitution. That such an imposition for the lack of the general attributes of true taxation can in no proper sense be considered a tax has been demonstrated by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] in the course of an argument which he delivered in this body last year that was absolutely, in my humble judgment, unanswerable.

At the same time it was demonstrated by other Senators fully as convincingly that if the farmer, willy nilly, is to be deprived of a part of the price that he receives for a commodity that act would unquestionably constitute a violation of the provisions of the Federal Constitution which forbid the taking of private property without due process of law and just compensation. But, as I have intimated, so far as any contention that the equalization fee contemplated by the pending bill would constitute a burden on the farmers is concerned, it is unnecessary to ask whether it is a tax; it is unnecessary to ask whether it operates as the taking of private property without due process of law, because the equalization fund is nothing but a purely factitious thing. Provided that the farmer obtained a proper price for his commodity it would make no material difference to him; I can not repeat too often whether there were an equalization fee created under the provisions of the pending bill or not.

It would be something that he would not only never get himself, but would never expect to get. It would be paid by the consumer, and by the consumer alone.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Maryland surely will concede, will he not, that the present marketing system of the farmer is not a success; that the farmer can not, under present conditions, without some central organization or some central power get that cooperation which is necessary to put his products on the market intelligently?

Mr. BRUCE. That situation would be met if the farmer went ahead and, with constitutional and reasonable aid from the Government, perfected his cooperative associations of every sort. I doubt whether the present system for the distribution of the farmer's produce is quite so bad as it has been represented to be; you can not have distribution any more than you can have production without cost; but I am willing to go to any point to which Congress may constitutionally go for the purpose of facilitating and cheapening the distribution of the farmers' commodities.

Mr. BORAH. Does not the Senator think that we have the constitutional power to set up machinery to enable the farmer successfully to market his products?

Mr. BRUCE. As the Senator from Idaho well knows, in the beginning of our Government it was doubted by no less a personage than Alexander Hamilton himself whether Congress had any constitutional power to appropriate money for the promotion of agriculture. We have long passed that period without boggling over any such constitutional scruples, and the country has reached the settled conclusion that agriculture is, as has been said, one of the "twin breasts" of the state, if not the public interest of supreme importance; and in consequence of this conclusion Congress has gone on year after year building up the superb structure of agricultural supervision and aid with which we are all now so familiar.

Suffice it to say that I am given no opportunity to say what my attitude toward the pending bill would be if the equalization fee were stricken from it, as well as all the other devices by which it seeks to produce plenty by first producing scarcity. Under proper conditions I should favor the extension of Federal pecuniary aid to farmers' cooperative marketing associations.

Mr. BORAH. Speaking purely as a question of constitutional authority, would there be any difference, so far as the Constitution is concerned, between setting up the machinery which is contemplated in the pending measure, leaving out the equalization fee, which would result in the successful marketing of the farmer's products, and the authority which we exercised in creating the Department of Agriculture and appropriating for it year after year in the effort to destroy the boll weevil and do other things which affect agriculture? Is there any difference, so far as the Constitution is concerned, in the exercise of those two authorities?

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I am not in the slightest degree questioning the constitutionality of the general measures that the Government has pursued for the purpose of promoting the welfare of agriculture; I have no disposition to do that, and I do not know that I would have the competency to do it successfully even if I were to attempt to do it; but the point I make is that, so far as the equalization fee is concerned—and that is the limit of my constitutional argument—it is an absolutely nugatory, unlawful, and unconstitutional thing; and, in my judgment, will be so declared whenever the question shall be submitted to the Supreme Court of the United States.

I am not impeaching the constitutionality of the provisions in the bill for loans and advances by the Federal Government for the purpose of strengthening the farmers' cooperatives; under proper restrictions and safeguards I am in sympathy with that idea; and even if I were disposed to doubt its constitutionality I should be very loath, indeed, to give any but a regretful expression to my doubt.

Mr. President, I had no thought of entering upon any general discussion of the pending bill when I sought to obtain the permission of the Senator from North Carolina to interrupt him for a moment. However, before I take my seat I wish to say that I think that there is no need at this time for such a measure except so far as it might be made to furnish reasonable pecuniary aid by the Government to the voluntary cooperative associations of the farmers themselves. If we were dealing with anyone but the farmer; that is to say, anyone but the individual who makes a particularly strong appeal to the sympathy and respect of us all, we would deal with this bill, I venture to say, in a very different spirit from that in which we are dealing with it now. There is nothing peculiar——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRUCE. I do.

Mr. BORAH. If we were not dealing with the farmer, in my judgment we would make an appropriation direct from the Treasury of the United States and set up machinery which would enable him to market his products. We have done that with reference to other industries, and, in my opinion, that is the rule that we ought to follow in this instance.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator from Idaho insists on harking back to the question of agricultural distribution machinery. I have not taken issue with the Senator on that point; I have not objected to the pending bill on that ground; but I do think that we would never have thought of giving our approval to such an artificial bill as it is if we were not dealing with the farmer, who is, for all kinds of reasons, as we know, apart from his numerical strength as a voter, peculiarly entitled, as has always been recognized from the beginning of our Government, to our cordial respect and support. Jefferson once declared that the farmer is the most virtuous and useful member of the whole community; and so he is.

Speaking from my own intimate familiarity with rural life, I do not hesitate to say I think that he lives more in harmony with higher standards of industry, personal integrity, and clean living than does any other member of the American body politic whomsoever.

I was born and spent my boyhood on a farm. That, of course, was many years ago. Among the farmers, in the vicinity of the farm, I can not recall a divorce nor, except where drink occasionally came in with the misfortunes that follow in its train, even an unhappy marriage; certainly not one solitary scandal that deeply stains the purity of domestic life.

But, as I have said, we are not approaching the problems which the pending bill seeks to solve as we would do an ordinary industrial predicament. There is nothing extraordinary however distressing, about the present plight of the farmer when traced back to its economic causes. During the World War all constructive peace work, so far as manufacturing industries were concerned, was laid aside, and all the industrial energies of the Nation were devoted to turning out supplies for the successful prosecution of the war. The consequence was that when the end of the war came there was a tremendous industrial slack to be caught up.

All sorts of industrial projects, all kinds of industrial needs that had been shelved during the war, had then to be taken up and accomplished or gratified; and it is that fact which furnishes the explanation of the period of amazing industrial prosperity which marked the history of this country after the close of the World War until a few months ago.

Now, however, that state of things is coming to an end. It is computed that in the city of Baltimore alone there are some 15,000 people unemployed at the present time; the number of the unemployed throughout the United States is now computed to mount up into the millions.

During the World War the farmer, too, passed through a period of wholly abnormal stimulation and activity. The war created an enormous demand for agricultural commodities of every sort, and the consequence was that men who were already farmers made it a point to put in larger crops than they had ever put in before, and men who never had been farmers and who scarcely knew the difference between a horse and an ox turned to farming as a pursuit. Besides, of course, as farmland values steadily rose many farmers went into the business of buying more land, either for the purposes of larger production or as a mere matter of land speculation; and the banks, especially throughout the Northwest, followed suit by making many imprudent loans on exaggerated agricultural values.

Of course, the result was that after the World War, while there was a tremendous industrial slack to catch up, there was no agricultural slack to catch up; and inevitably there followed a period of agricultural depression, disaster, and bankruptcy, bringing ruin more or less in some parts of the country to the farmer, the banking interests, and all interests immediately affiliated with agriculture.

Mr. BORAH. They deflated the farmer a little hurriedly, too, did they not?

Mr. BRUCE. I have heard that alleged by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]. I do not know; I have never heard any other Member of the Senate, so far as I can recall, lay very much stress upon that idea.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator lay no stress on it?

Mr. BRUCE. I do not know how far it is true in point of fact that the farmer was subjected after the World War to a ruthless period of deflation by the banking system of the country or by any banking agencies of any sort.

Mr. BORAH. I think the facts are available.

Mr. BRUCE. Well, I do not know. It is useless, it seems to me, to go into that as the real cause of the misfortunes that overtook the farmer after the World War, when the results of natural economic deflation were so inevitable under the circumstances.

All that the present agricultural situation calls for is the healing influence of time, except, as I have said before, so far as the Government, by legitimate and constitutional pecuniary aid, can assist the farmer to perfect his cooperative agencies of distributon.

For some years now, if our Secretaries of Agriculture can be believed, if the wisest economists of the country can be believed, a slow but steady process of improvement has been taking place in the condition of the farmer. Agricultural labor has been going down. Agricultural commodities everywhere have been going up—not rapidly, it is true, but measurably, substantially—and I think I can say without a moment's hesitation that if there was no justification for such a measure as this McNary-Haugen bill at the last session of Congress, there is still less justification for it now, because the condition of agriculture at the present time is in every respect better than it was at the last session of Congress.

A great deal of stress has been laid upon the fact that some 3,000,000 farmers have quit farming. If that exodus had taken place in connection with the nonagricultural industries of the country, it would, perhaps, not have received the attention that it has. Everybody would have said that those industries were simply responding to the ordinary, normal play of natural economic forces. But as soon as farmers were seen quitting the farm and going off to industrial establishments and getting employment at highly satisfactory wages such a phenomenon was accepted as one of the most ominous, the most unprecedented, the most tragic character.

It was distressing enough, but that, of course, is the way in which economic adversity in any particular branch of industry always relieves itself; that is to say, shifting a large body of the workers in it to other pursuits. It is partly because of that exodus of farmers that agricultural prices are again found today in the ascending scale, and a steady improvement in every respect in the general agricultural conditions is setting in.

The present bill but repeats the old story of disregarding the admonitions of the wisest of all physicians, nature, and resorting to the quack and his nostrum. It is enough for me to say that I feel that I would be untrue to my representative function, would be disloyal to my obligations to my constituency, including the farmer himself, if I did not, as the President of the United States has done and so many other Members of this body and of the other House have done, set my face like flint against this bill—this bill which has a lisp of alluring deceit upon its lips, but nothing but dead sea ashes in its breast.

Always the worst enemy of the farmer ever since my boyhood has been not the San Jose scale or the boll weevil or the corn borer but the demagogue and the charlatan.

Over and over again false friends of the farmer have come forward to suggest some visionary or delusive remedy for his ills, and from the agitations kindled by them many demoralizing and destructive sequels have followed. I hardly exaggerate when I say that since the American Civil War the pathway of our political history has been strewn with the bleaching and dissolving bones of economic fallacies like those that lurk in the pending bill.

How well do I recollect Peffer, with his long, straggling beard, and "Sockless" Simpson, and all the legislative quacks of that time! How well do I remember some of their successors, bred by the Populist movement and the free-silver movement! Of all those agrarian agitations, not one single, solitary one ever came to anything so far as solid benefit to the farmer was concerned—not a solitary one of them.

Here now is another similar proposal. We are again asked to defy nature, to scorn the ordinary laws of supply and demand, to experiment with legislative price fixing, to make a whole industry prosperous by artificial legislative hypertrophy.

I do not object, under proper conditions, to the farmer receiving a special benefit. I think that he has peculiar claims to legislative consideration. But bear in mind that whatever the other consequences of this bill may be, one will be to make the cost of living in many respects dearer to every man, woman, and child in this country, including the farmer himself, than it would otherwise be.

When this bill was brought in at the last session it included only some six agricultural commodities. Now it includes all. I doubt very much whether it will work as it is intended to work; but should it do so, of course it would be in the power of the Federal farm board, created by it, at any time that it pleased to create such a dearth in the volume of an agricultural commodity as to make that commodity—whether it is corn or wheat or pork, or whatnot—just that much more expensive to all American citizens, including the farmer himself.

In the region where I live the most profitable branch of agriculture at the present time is the dairy industry. I have had more than one farmer near Baltimore say to me in recent years that but for the milk, butter, and other dairy products which he sold he could not make both ends meet. This bill, however, contemplates nothing less than that for the benefit of the wheat and the corn grower the prices of all the feedstuffs that the dairyman uses in his operations shall be greatly enhanced.

Some Members of the Senate seem to think of farmers merely as producers of the things they sell. They, too, are also consumers of the things that they buy. Farmers, as well as the rest of the community, will buy many agricultural products after this bill goes into effect, if it does go into effect, that they themselves do not raise, and they, as well as the rest of the community, will have to pay the swollen prices which this bill has been devised for the purpose of fixing.

Of course, if the bill works, we shall pass through the same old round of sickening experiences that we passed through when agricultural profits became deflated after the World War. The same spirit of land speculation will be revived; men who are utter tyros, as far as farming is concerned, will again be resorting to farming as a profession. The farm market will again be overstocked. Again there will be entirely too many farmers working the soil, entirely too many farmers growing crops, entirely too many farmers speculating in land, entirely too many farmers borrowing money from the banks. Farm acreage will increase. Farm surpluses will be still more intractable. Again we should see repeated all the disastrous consequences that flowed from the World War period of agricultural expansion. Such results always follow in the economic field from artificial stimulation in any form. They follow just as naturally as intoxication follows from the excessive use of drink.

Some years ago the British in India, alarmed by the number of human beings who were killed every year by the cobra da capello, offered a reward for the head of every cobra. What was the result? The cobras did not diminish in number and soon the fact came to light that the Hindus were actually raising cobras for the purpose of getting the recompense for their heads.

Not only would the pending bill, if it became an act, render every agricultural commodity dearer to all the citizens of our own land, including the farmer himself, but it would make the same commodities cheaper to the inhabitants of foreign lands, thereby enabling our industrial competitors abroad to prosecute their rivalry with us more effectively than ever.

Mr. President, there are innumerable other objections that I could urge to the pending bill, but many of them have become trite and threadbare by constant reiteration in the course of the discussion that has gone on over it. I really had not intended to say anything to-day at any length about it, for I expressed my opposition to it as pointedly, as clearly, and as cogently at the last session of Congress as I was capable of doing. My idea had been until to-day to remain silent with reference to it and simply to register my opposition to it when the time for voting came, trusting that the President of the United States, with the calm mental balance and the fearless spirit that he has always brought to the discharge of his duty in relation to Congress, would again veto it. Indeed, since the publication of his veto message in relation to the McNary-Haugen bill at the last session of Congress it has hardly been necessary for anyone to urge any additional objections to it. I regard that veto message as one of the clearest, one of the most convincing, and one of the ablest messages that has emanated for many a day from a President of the United States. It was only a few days ago that I took it up again and read it with renewed pleasure and instruction, from its first word to its last, and I only wish I could induce every Member of this body to do the same thing before he votes "aye" or "no" on the pending bill.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I am not going to take the time of the Senate to discuss the mechanics of this bill. Everyone knows that the bill is an effort on the part of Congress to make the tariff effective for agriculture. I never at any time have labored under the delusion or tried to make anyone believe that it carries a complete remedy for the agricultural situation in the United States at the present time.

So far as the tariff affects the manufacturing industries of the country and the manufactured articles that the farmer must buy, to that extent it is hoped that the bill will remove the handicap of his having to buy manufactured products in a protected market and sell the raw material in an unprotected market.

There is nothing in this bill that I can see that will remove the handicaps that agriculture suffers from time to time due to the manipulation, the fluctuation of the money and credit situation of the country. There is nothing in this bill to prevent another deflation by the Federal reserve bank system like the one we suffered in 1920 and 1921. There is nothing in this bill to overcome the very heavy burden of freight rates imposed upon agriculture in this country by the passage of the Esch-Cummins railroad law.

If I may, in connection with the discussion of agricultural products, bring to the attention of the Senate the additional burden placed upon the back of agriculture of not only having to buy in a protected market, but the other burden of having to pay the freight both ways on what we have to sell and what we have to buy; and, due to the transportation act, having had freight rates raised from 50 to 75 per cent due to that act, I feel that a discussion of the agricultural situation can not be complete unless that question of freight rates is analyzed with it.

I have here an editorial from the Wall Street Journal, in which the editor pays me the compliment of taking me to task for a statement I made in the city of Minneapolis last fall in discussing the agricultural situation from the economic standpoint. Because we have heard so much about the term "economic soundness" when we discuss the agricultural situation, I thought it might be interesting to the Senate to have an example of the views on economic soundness of some of the high priests of that cult who criticize us for proposing something that is economically unsound and their understanding of the economics of agriculture and the freight situation.

The editorial is headed by a caption "A mistaken Senator." It reads:

> People familiar with the United States Senate, and even with United States Senators, say that HENRIK SHIPSTEAD, senior Senator from Minnesota, improves upon acquaintance.

I might say that I do not take the time of the Senate to read that statement simply for the purpose——

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator will admit it, will he not?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I will not admit anything. I will not even admit that it is a compliment. He goes on to say:

> He has made occasional speeches in the Senate which were almost entirely devoid of the populist progressive nonsense which was his stock in trade when he entered politics. He is a dentist by profession and credibly reported to be a good one. He returned to his early bad manner the other day.
>
> This is what he said to a gathering of business men in Minneapolis: "The National Government can not create wealth, but it does distribute wealth. Government price fixing has been declared unsound by many experts, yet the Government has fixed prices and the income yield for the railroads. Through a high protective tariff the Government has enabled our industries to fix prices on merchandise, all of which we pay. We pay freight two ways, first on the raw material and then on the manufactured article."
> Senator SHIPSTEAD is confusing fixed prices with guaranteed prices, and the Government does not guarantee railroad earnings, much less fix railroad freight rates.

Here is this apostle of economic soundness making the declaration that the Government of the United States does not fix railroad rates. He continues:

> The law merely limits those rates. If one of those farmers whose friend Senator SHIPSTEAD professes to be had the profit on what he produces limited by act of Congress to 6 per cent, with anything above that to be divided 50-50 with his improvident neighbors, he would be in the position of the railroads, except that his farm is private property while the railroad is a public utility.

Any railroad can reduce rates, and thousands of reductions have been made since the last horizontal advance was conceded by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I know of two cases, one on coal, the Lake Cargo cases, and when the Soo Line and the Minneapolis & St. Louis Railroad attempted to lower rates to the seaboard on wheat, and both were denied the privilege by the Interstate Commerce Commission under the law.

The editorial proceeds:

For all the Government, which means Congress, cares the railroads can go into bankruptcy. But no efficiency, however wise and however valuable to the community, will enable the railroad stockholder to earn a reward such as other property holders are allowed to reap without question.

I have on my desk some statistics to show what has been the fate of property and of agriculture in answer to what he says that property has enjoyed since the passage of the transportation act.

The editorial then proceeds:

What does Senator SHIPSTEAD think he means when he says that "we," presumably himself and the farmers, "pay the freight two ways"? Of all men the farmer consumer is least concerned about the tariff. His own product is highly protected, and he is more nearly self-supporting than any of the 72 per cent of our population not engaged in agriculture. Does Mr. SHIPSTEAD think that he pays freight on the wool he ships to market, and pays freight again when that wool is manufactured into cloth? The consumer pays the freight, and if, by some magical process, the farmer's wool could be transported to the factory without cost and without the help of the railroad, the beneficiary would be the manufacturer because he, and not the farmer, pays the freight, taking it back ultimately from the wearers of the cloth he manufactures.

I take it that this is an example of the economic soundness doctrine of these people who have for all these years been fighting some kind of a measure upon which the agricultural sections of the country could agree and upon which a majority of the Congress could agree. I want to analyze his statement. He asks some economic questions in his editorial. I would not take the time of the Senate on this matter did not the economic queries raised deal with one of the principal measures of this session, namely, legislation aiming at stabilization of the agricultural industry.

The point to which the Wall Street Journal takes exception, indeed, the ground which the editorial writer bases his contention that I am a "mistaken Senator," appears to be that the farmer pays the freight two ways. The editor contends that the manufacturer pays the freight on the raw material from the farm to the factory, and thereafter passes the cost of the freight to the consumer.

Our Wall Street editor, therefore, seems to be laboring under the presumption that the farmer is in a position to, and actually does, fix the price on his product, a price presumably based on production cost, and that the manufacturer has to pay this farm-fix price plus cost of transportation.

It is not difficult to understand, Mr. President, where this Wall Street editor has been living during the past 20 years. He has been living not far from his editorial sanctum. Certainly he has never been on a farm, or in a farming community, nor given any attention to farm-marketing conditions, or to the recognized data of the farm problem during the past decade.

It will not be contended that the present Secretary of Agriculture is a radical governed by ideas of "populist progressive nonsense," such as charged in this editorial, or that any such "populist progressive" has held the Agriculture portfolio in the past 20 years. Yet the basic method followed by the Department of Agriculture for years, in its economic analysis to arrive at the farm price, is this well-known rule: Take the market price fixed by the traders and factory buyers at the distant terminal market, deduct from that price the transportation and handling costs between the terminal market and the farm, deduct insurance and commissions and overhead costs and profits of the dealers, and the net residue, or what is left, is the farm price—what the middlemen and factory and railroad permit the farmer to receive for his product.

The farmer has no more voice in naming the price of his product than he has in regulating the revolutions of the stars. So far as the price of his product is concerned, the farmer is to-day, as in feudal time, a subject vassal. He takes what the produce trade, the manufacturer, the elevator system, and the transportation agency see fit to leave him.

He pays the freight on his own product. The freight comes out of the farm price. He pays the commissions, costs, and profits of the middlemen—it all comes out of the farm price. The manufacturer pays only the price fixed by the trade of which he is a member—and not a cent more. The farmer gets the fixed-trade price less the freight, other costs, and profits. Thus the farmer pays two ways—the freight on what he sells and the freight on what he buys.

And that is the reason why the world to-day has a farm problem. That is why the American Congress, for now the fourth successive session, has wrestled with a farm problem—how to place the farmer on the same economic basis of a fair return as other industry—how to insure him a fair prospect of a farm price yielding production cost, a normal return on his investment, remuneration for his labor, and exemption from the unjust exaction that compels him to pay the freight both ways. The unjust position of the farmer, Mr. President, is that he pays not only his own costs but the costs of everyone else from the time the crop leaves the farm until it enters the mill door.

The farm problem, the condition surrounding the marketing of the Nation's staple crops, is nothing new. It is nothing new in either House of Congress. It is nothing new to the executive branch of Government, as shown by the reports and research work of the Department of Agriculture and its numerous bureaus for nearly a generation, and as shown by numerous messages of the President on the subject. It is not new to the country at large. It is not new to public economists. Indeed, the unfortunate marketing dilemma of agriculture seems to be recognized by all economists discussing our national problem. Did I say all, Mr. President? No; all but one—the editor of the Wall Street Journal.

It is strange that our Wall Street editor is not familiar with the notable economic research work of that "safe and sane" economist, Secretary Jardine, of the Department of Agriculture. These two eminent economists—one in Washington, D. C., as the chief agricultural authority of the present administration, and the other in Wall Street as chief editor of the stock-ticker industry—ought to be able to find agreement in at least the fundamentals of economic interest.

Our Wall Street editor finds that the farmer is "highly protected and he is more nearly self-supporting than any of the 72 per cent of our population not engaged in agriculture."

On the other hand, Secretary Jardine, editor of the Yearbook of Agriculture, 1926, page 1204, finds that the value of the 22 main farm crops dropped from $12,442,977,000 in the census year 1919 to $7,036,786,000 in 1926—a shrinkage of $5,406,000,000, or 43 per cent, in seven years. Secretary Jardine also finds that the shrinkage in value of all crops from $14,755,000,000 in 1919 to $8,415,000,000 in 1926 amounts to $6,340,000,000, a 43 per cent shrinkage in the gross income of American agriculture during a seven-year period, when industrials and railways, as shown by the stock-exchange records of the Wall Street Journal, have shown the greatest expansion of income.

In the daily Market Diary published by the Wall Street Journal we find that the average "high" quotation of the 20 leading industrials has risen steadily from 120.51 in 1924 to 159.39 in 1925 and from that to 166.64 in 1926 and 199.78 in 1927. Here is a three-year increase in the market value of 20 leading industrials netting 77 points, or 64 per cent. A similar rise in value of railway stocks is noted in the Wall Street Market Diary—99.30 in 1924, 112.98 in 1925, 123.32 in 1926, and 144.82 in 1927. The leading 20 railroad securities have advanced in the past three years 45 per cent in stock-ticker values.

Secretary Jardine, in his 1926 yearbook, takes the books of 15,330 typical farms of a larger size, averaging 304 acres, valued at $14,157 per farm, and works out the average farm income for 1925 on a farm of this presumed better-than-average prosperity. The average gross receipts of this $14,157 farm are $2,965 for the year. The cash outlay for labor, taxes, and other expenses is $1,477. The receipts, less cash outlay, are $1,074—less than the annual income of a common laborer on a street job. The interest paid averages $225. There is a credit of $223 for increase in personal property inventory, partially offset by $131 paid for farm improvement. The value of the family labor, including the farm owner, is placed at $994.

This last item is worth attention. The labor of both the owner of the average $14,000 farm, together with the labor of his family, is computed by the Government as worth $994 a year, or, less than $3 a day, and this in a period of so-called nation-wide prosperity.

In table 507, page 1207 of the 1926 yearbook, Secretary Jardine presents the final table of analysis showing "Returns from farming: Returns to labor and capital."

The return to capital on this 304-acre farm is $778. The return to all unpaid labor is $542. The return to the operator—family labor at hired labor rates—is $219 a year. His interest on capital investment at 6 per cent is $1,029. Therefore he does well, in taking a gambling chance against the elements and the traders who fix the price of his product, if he comes out at the end of the year with any balance at all to stave off the mortgage holder and sheriff.

Such is the financial status of an industry which leads all others both in the amount of capital investment and in the number of people dependent upon it for a living. The census of 1920 gave the total capital investment of American farms at $77,923,000,000, which was greater than the combined capital investment of manufactures and mines, national banks, and railways.

Since 1920 the value of farm property has been reduced by $20,000,000,000; the number of farms has been reduced; the ranks of the farmers have been cut down. The value of farm implements and machinery on the farms has been reduced, as shown by the agricultural census of 1925, by $900,000,000, and the value of livestock on the farms has been reduced by over $3,000,000,000.

President Coolidge in his recent message to the Seventieth Congress reminded us, "We must, however, preserve the sanctity of a balanced Budget." He was speaking of the Federal revenue. But the greatest Budget balance sheet the sanctity of which we as representatives of the States are bound in legislative duty to respect is the balance sheet of an industry which even in its depleted state represents a capital investment of $57,000,000,000, or nearly that of the railways and stock-ticker industrials combined—an industry that supports a rural population of 40,000,000 in producing the food of the Nation and the home market for all industrials.

The grave problem which confronts us now is whether the balance to which the farm industry is presumed to be entitled has any substantial existence in fact. Not only has the halo of sanctity been blown away, but the balance itself is hard to find. It seems to exist only in theory and in red ink.

It must be borne in mind that the select list of 15,000 farms of 300-acre size which Secretary Jardine employed as a basis for arriving at a tiny credit balance at the end of the farm year were exceptional, probably much above the average in prosperity. They were twice the size of the average American farm, and were farms that were supposed to be run on a business basis, farms that kept books. Let us now picture what the balance sheet is likely to show when the agricultural industry is taken as a whole.

The agricultural census of 1925 shows 6,371,640 farms with a total capital investment of $57,000,000,000 and the annual farm crop valued at $7,472,000,000. The average farm is 145 acres, worth about $9,000, and the value of the average crop per farm is a little under $1,200.

The interest alone, at 6 per cent on the $9,000 investment, is $540. This leaves from the $1,200 crop a balance of $660 a year to meet taxes, cost of tools, fertilizer, house and barn repairs, medical and burial expenses, but would hardly leave a balance large enough to support the hired man. The cows and chickens would probably pay the grocery bill. But how to raise a balance to clothe the family—that, again, is another thing. The sanctity of the budget balance might depend upon the income from the pigs. But the editor of the Wall Street Journal says that the American farmer is doing better than the average American in other lines of business, notwithstanding the mounting earnings and stock prices of the industrials; while President Coolidge predicts a continued wave of prosperity, crowned with Budget balance sanctity.

A balanced Budget in Federal revenue and expense all approve, but the principle of a balanced Budget should not stop with Federal income in Washington, D. C. Its application should be nation-wide. It is not a healthy sign, Mr. President, when a selected list of industrials shows mounting incomes and stock values reaching 60 per cent in three brief years, while the farms that feed the Nation are being deserted or falling under the sheriff's hammer because they have no balance with which to meet their debts.

We need a balance not only in our Federal Budget but in our prosperity as a nation. The present lack of balance is well illustrated in two cases which I now present. The two authorities to whom I am indebted for the statement of facts are, on the one hand, the Secretary of Agriculture, and on the other, the Wall Street Journal—perhaps the two highest authorities in their respective crop and stock fields.

Secretary Jardine, in his 1926 yearbook, finds that the farm value of wheat per acre in the United States in 1926 (p. 1208) was $17.12, while the cost of wheat production per acre (p. 1209), based on 1925 cost data, was $22.41, a loss of $5.29 per acre, not including fixed charges such as taxes and interest on the farm investment.

In my own State—Minnesota—the value of the wheat crop averaged $15.86 per acre against $18.61 as the production cost. In North and South Dakota, where there was a partial wheat crop failure in 1926, the loss was still more heavy. Montana, Missouri, and Nebraska came out with about the same margin of loss as Minnesota. Kansas showed a slight margin of about $2 per acre over production cost, but not enough to meet taxes and interest on the farm investment. Iowa, Oklahoma, and Texas realized a small balance over production cost, but hardly enough to pay interest, taxes, the grocer, and oil and garage charges. Pacific Coast States failed to recover production cost.

The wheat growers of the great State of New York—it seems that somewhere west of Wall Street farmers are still growing wheat—realized a farm value of $23.10 per acre for their wheat crop, while the cost of raising it was $32.75 per acre. That is to say, New York wheat growers failed to get back their production cost by a margin of $9.65 per acre. To meet their taxes and interest on capital invested, pay the grocer and the cost of painting the house and shingling the barn, the wheat growers of the Genesee Valley perhaps called upon an intermediate credit agency in Wall Street. But it is doubtful if even the keen ear of a Wall Street editor was able to detect on the stock ticker any sound like a dividend for the wheat growers of New York State.

Turn now to the companion picture—the Wall Street Journal report of December 9 on the National Biscuit Co., an industrial which converts the farmer's wheat into the finished product, crackers. "National Biscuit expansion broad" is the headline and then follows this amazing tale of five-year profits:

> When National Biscuit sold at 179 recently, it was 84¼ points above the low of the year. Old shareholders who have held the stock since before 1922, when it was split on a seven to one basis, see their old stock selling to-day on a basis of $1,253 a share, and their income at the current rate of $6 a share and $1 extra is $49 a share.

Par value of National Biscuit shares is $25. So in five years of industrial prosperity this $25 share has been split seven to one, until the original share is now worth $1,253, and earns this year $49 on the original $25 par—or, about 196 per cent on the 1922 investment. The Wall Street Journal truly says that National Biscuit expansion is "broad." We are not surprised at the further information:

> PROBABILITY OF A 30 PER CENT STOCK DIVIDEND
> It is believed this policy will develop with a probability of a 30 per cent stock dividend or more, representing the money put into the plant in the last five years being declared.

Naturally, what can the company do when its profits are so "broad," except to issue a "stock dividend or more"? Besides, when the profits are swollen to stock-dividend size, there is economy in converting them into a stock dividend, because stock dividends are exempt from the income tax.

The report closes by calling attention to the strong balance sheet of the National Biscuit Co.—"net current assets of $32,525,294 and current liabilities of $5,465,148, a ratio of approximately six to one." Further we read:

> Cash alone at $5,540,213 exceeded current liabilities and the company had $14,000,000 in Government securities.

Here is a budget balance that would appeal to the President. The sanctity of its budget balance has been so well preserved that, to quote the closing sentence of the Wall Street Journal report:

> It is quite possible that earnings for the full year, despite the usual generous writeoffs, will show considerably better than $7 a share on the junior stock (par $25).

The friends of agriculture in the Seventieth Congress, Mr. President, make no demands for a Budget balance as "broad" or as full of "sanctity" as that so ably described by the Wall Street Journal. No farmer dreams of earning $7 net on each $25 invested, but he does hope to recover production cost and enough to pay interest and taxes. No one has yet devised a scheme by which farm shares can be split 7 to 1, so that a $25 investment will be worth $1,253 in five years and earn $49 a year on the original $25. But the Seventieth Congress does hope, I believe, that some just and workable measure of market stabilization may be established that will prevent a farm capital shrinkage of another $20,000,000,000 in the next seven years and a 43 per cent drop in the value of American crops.

We have been speaking of wheat and comparing the returns of the wheat grower with the returns of an industrial that converts wheat into a finished product. Let us now compare the price returns of the farm from hides with the price of the finished product, shoes. For our authority we have Secretary Hoover, editor of the Commerce Yearbook, 1926.

On page 527 Mr. Hoover finds that the average price of No. 1 Chicago calfskin during the years 1912–1916 was 21.3 cents a pound. The price at the end of 1926 was 17 cents a pound—a drop of 4.3 cents a pound.

A companion finished product, men's blucher calf shoes, page 538, rose in price from $3.11 in 1913 to $6.40 in 1926—an increase of something over 100 per cent.

It is plain that the farm producer had very little to say about the price of his hides, while the producer of men's blucher calf shoes had a good deal to say about fixing the price of his product. That the farmer paid the freight both ways is plain enough when we note that the farm product, hides, dropped 20 per cent during the period when the finished product, calf shoes, rose 100 per cent. Here is a case where the farmer pays the freight not two ways merely, but several other ways not enumerated.

Mr. President, I wish now to clinch the point as to who pays the freight by bringing into harmony those two eminent authorities, the Wall Street Journal and the Secretary of Agriculture. The proof of the point lies even in the market columns of the Wall Street Journal and other commercial dailies of the metropolitan centers, and the basic evidence has been admitted in fact, though not in theory, for over a generation.

When wheat, for example, is on an export basis, which is most of the time, the market price is fixed in Liverpool. That is why the grain trade and all commercial journals cite the Liverpool price in publishing market quotations. With the Liverpool price as a base when wheat is on an export basis, the New York price, other conditions being the same, is the Liverpool price less the freight, insurance, and commissions between Liverpool and New York, and the Chicago price, allowing for the gambling raids of bulls and bears, is the Liverpool price less the freight, other expenses, and profits between Liverpool and Chicago. Finally, the farm price computed by the Department of Agriculture for the Mississippi and Missouri Valley wheat belt is the Chicago price less the freight, profits, and other costs between Chicago and the farm.

Thus all the freights by rail and ocean and all the costs and profits between Liverpool and the farm come out of the farm value of the crop. The farmer pays all the costs at the source, when he sells his crop at the terminal market price less the freight, less all the costs, less all the profits. The editor of the Wall Street Journal has only to consult his own market columns, both the market quotations and the daily market discussion, to find that he and his numerous colleagues in the stock and produce exchange markets have admitted and taken the facts for granted from the day they or their fathers and grandfathers published their first market quotations in years so far gone that they have forgotten the significance of their own findings.

Why do the market journals and the Yearbook of Agriculture publish the Liverpool price for the American product wheat? Because the Liverpool price is the clearing-house base and the yardstick for wheat price fixing the world around. Given the Liverpool price when wheat is on its normal export basis, our Department of Agriculture knows the farm price in every State in the Union by simply charging to the farmer and deducting from his price all the costs by rail and sea for 3,000 to 5,000 miles of transportation. Does the farmer pay the freight? He pays the freight and more. He pays the insurance and commissions. He pays for the handling, the overhead, and the profits of all the intermediary agencies and gambling paraphernalia between Liverpool and the western farm.

Take a case. The 1926 yearbook, issued by Secretary Jardine for the information of agriculture and the grain trade, gives the Liverpool wheat price for December, 1926, as $1.80 per bushel. The average combined price for the four principal wheat markets—Chicago, Minneapolis, Kansas City, and St. Louis—for December wheat is $1.39. The estimated December farm price received by wheat producers is $1.19.

In other words, between the Liverpool $1.80 the freight and other costs and profits being deducted bring the average price at the four mid-western terminal markets down to $1.39, a net deduction of 41 cents a bushel. Between the $1.39 of the four mid-west markets and the farm there is an average freight and profit deduction of about 20 cents a bushel, bringing the farm price down to $1.19. Did the farmer pay the freight? The price he received tells the story. He not only paid the freight but he paid all the costs and profits from the farm to Liverpool, amounting to 61 cents per bushel, which is shown by the farm price which the accountants and statisticians of the Federal Department of Agriculture have computed for him.

Mr. President, I have given an analysis of the marketing of farm products, including the freight situation, as outlined for us in the reports of the Secretary of Agriculture and the editor of the Wall Street Journal, in order that the picture, if it is possible to make it more clear, shall be made more clear.

It has been difficult to diagnose the situation in order that we may prescribe a remedy. It has been very difficult to find a remedy. It has been difficult to agree upon a remedy. It has been difficult to agree upon a remedy that is adequate and complete. I doubt very much that we have a remedy here that is adequate and complete. We can not afford to fool ourselves, nor can we afford to fool the American people. I think we are making a step in the right direction. We have agreed upon a legislative measure that it is admitted will be of considerable help. This is the first time to my knowledge that the American people have ever been able to agree upon a measure that will have such widespread effect in the solution of a great national problem.

I am not going to go into any detailed discussion of the arguments that have been based upon the unconstitutionality of appropriating money out of the Federal Treasury to help a private business. One very distinguished Senator discussed the unconstitutionality of taking money out of the Federal Treasury to aid private business. In my opinion, it makes no difference whether you take the money out of the Federal Treasury or out of the pockets of the American people; it all comes from the same source; and I contend that for the past 30 or 40 years this Government has been busy taking money out of the pockets of our citizens to help private business all over the country except the farmer.

What was the transportation act, the Esch-Cummins railroad law, but taking money out of the pockets of American citizens for the benefit of shareholders of railroad corporations? Where does the money in the Federal Treasury come from if not from the pockets of the American people? It is true that in filling the Treasury of the United States you call it taxes; in filling the treasuries of the railroads you call it freight rates; but the laws under which both treasuries are filled are passed by Congress, and the payment is inevitable. So, whether you take the money out of the Federal Treasury, or pass a law like the high protective tariff or the Esch-Cummins railroad law, you are passing legislation the effect of which is to take money out of the pockets of American citizens to help private individuals; and it is that kind of legislation that we have been protesting against for years.

Of course it is paternalistic. Of course, it is bureaucratic. We have always protested against it. We have never wanted it. We did not create this situation. It has been created for us, and in self-defense we are forced now to come to Congress for our own preservation and protection and ask for the same kind of legislation to protect the agricultural industry, involving the investment of more money than is invested in all the transportation companies and all the industrial companies of the United States, where the welfare of 40,000,000 people is involved. In their behalf we are asking for this legislation now.

I said in the beginning, and I say now, that I do not believe this bill carries an adequate and complete remedy for the situation; but it is something that we have agreed upon, and we have taken a step further in advance than we have in the past 25 years in the solution of this problem.

I have tried to protest against taking money out of the Treasury of the United States to send the marines down to Latin America for the purpose of protecting the investment, which is not large, of American interests there. If we are going to spend money for the protection of American property, if we are going to uphold the sanctity of property anywhere, we ought to do it first with American citizens here at home. Why can not some of these people who are so anxious to spend thousands and millions of dollars, they say, for the protection of American investments abroad, spend something to protect the rights of property, the sanctity of property, and investments in the United States?

The slogan for some years has been "We must put agriculture on a par with industry." If this legislation becomes a law, and if it accomplishes everything that has been claimed for it, it will still come far short of putting agriculture on a par with industry.

They say we ask too much. We have not asked enough. We are asking for the return of a little of what has been taken away from us. If the business of the Government is to protect property, it is the business of the Government to protect the property of all of its citizens, and not take property from the many for the benefit of the few. That is the business of government—to establish justice for all of the people and not merely for the few.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire first to modify some of the amendments I have offered. I will ask the clerk to state the first amendment as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 5, after line 15, the Senator from Tennessee proposed to insert an amendment beginning, "No action having a general application." It is proposed to strike out the words "a general" and insert the words "an exclusive," so that it will read:

No action having an exclusive application to any one commodity shall be taken by the board unless first approved by a majority of the advisory council.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator have the goodness to explain the significance of that proposed amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. The original amendment seems to be satisfactory to everyone, except for the words "a general" before the word "application." I will have to read the amendment in order to explain it to the Senator. As modified it would read:

No action having an exclusive application to any one commodity shall be taken by the board unless first approved by a majority of the advisory council.

It was thought by a number of Senators that the words "a general" should be stricken out and that the words "an exclusive" should be inserted. That is acceptable to me, and I ask that the amendment be adopted as modified.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, does not that amendment make the advisory council the really powerful body under the bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. No, it does not; it merely gives the advisory council of a certain commodity the right to veto actions upon the part of the board that have exclusive application to that particular commodity, that is all. The general administration of the act, all the powers of the act, are still in the board.

Mr. DILL. I understand that; but does it not make it the authoritative body as to the particular product under consideration to which the law would apply, or on which this board would act?

Mr. McKELLAR. It would give it this authority of veto. It would have no other power. It would have no power to initiate action. I will illustrate.

Suppose an equalization fee is proposed by the general board to be placed upon wheat. I believe wheat is raised in the Senator's State in large quantities. Suppose a majority of the advisory council should be opposed to putting an equalization fee upon wheat at that time, that majority of the council would have the power to veto the action of the board.

Mr. DILL. Then it becomes, in fact, the ruling power as to whether or not a product shall come under the terms of the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes.

Mr. DILL. So that it becomes really the powerful body as affecting the product under consideration.

Mr. McKELLAR. It has that power. It does not become the powerful body, because it would have no power of initiation, no power to carry out the terms of the act. It simply would have a veto power on such a question as that.

Mr. DILL. Neither would the general board have power of initiation, if the advisory council objected to it.

Mr. McKELLAR. It would have the power of initiation, but not the power of carrying out until it was approved by the advisory council.

Mr. HARRIS. The advisory board, I understand, would have the veto power, and could postpone indefinitely, if it wished.

Mr. McKELLAR. If it desired, as long as they voted that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee, as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will ask the clerk to state the next amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 7, after line 11, insert:

No marketing period under section 7 in respect of any agricultural commodity shall be commenced or terminated unless the advisory council for such commodity concurs in the respective finding or findings which the board is required to make prior to the commencement or termination of the marketing period. No equalization fee shall be collected unless the estimates upon which the determination of the amount of the equalization fee is based are concurred in by the advisory council for the commodity.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the amendment which was suggested by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] and very strongly approved by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], about which we had the controversy a few moments ago. It takes the place of the two amendments on page 3 of the amendment offered by me. I ask that the amendment as read be adopted.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum. I do not think these important amendments ought to be acted on in the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield for that purpose?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield for that purpose. I would like to have a quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Barkley	Fess	McKellar	Shipstead
Bayard	Fletcher	McLean	Shortridge
Bingham	Frazier	McMaster	Simmons
Black	Gerry	McNary	Smith

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-nine Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee to insert on page 7, after line 11, what has been read at the desk.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will ask the clerk to state the next amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 11, line 2, strike out all after the word "as" and insert in lieu thereof:

the board finds that such arrangements are no longer necessary or advisable for carrying out the policy in section 1, and if such findings are concurred in by a majority of the advisory council.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the clerk may state the next amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 13, after the word "or," in line 19, insert the words "after giving 12 months' notice to the advisory council of the commodity affected."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. I now offer the next amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 13, line 24, after the word "office," insert the words "and the approval of a majority of the advisory council."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. I offer now the next amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 15, line 2, strike out all after the period down through the word "publish," in line 4, and insert in lieu thereof:

Upon the basis of such estimates there shall be from time to time determined, and if such estimates are concurred in by a majority of the advisory council for such commodity the board shall publish.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. I now offer the next amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 15, line 13, insert the following:

The equalization fee herein provided for upon any commodity shall not be imposed until the same is approved by a majority of the advisory council for that commodity.

Mr. McKELLAR. I may state that that becomes necessary because it is directly under that part of the bill referring to the equalization fee. It has been stated in substance already by the amendment to which the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has referred and which he has in mind.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator from Tennessee will pardon me, I think he is getting into the bill two contradictory provisions.

Mr. McKELLAR. In order to determine that question, I ask that the amendment may go over for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the next amendment may be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 15, line 15, strike out the words "determined upon" and insert in lieu thereof the words "so published."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. The next two amendments, set forth in lines 14 to 18 on page 4 of my proposed printed amendments, I now withdraw and ask that the next amendment may be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 24, line 1, before the word "dollars," strike out "two hundred and fifty million" and insert in lieu thereof "four hundred million," so as to read:

There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, etc., $400,000,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. [Putting the question.] The nays seem to have it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FESS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE]. I am informed that if he were present he would vote "yea." If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay." I withhold my vote.

Mr. CARAWAY (when the name of Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas was called). My colleague the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is confined to his apartment by illness. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARRIS. My colleague the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] is unavoidably absent. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. KING (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL]. I am unable to obtain a transfer and am compelled reluctantly to withdraw my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DENEEN] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED];

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL]; and

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] are necessarily detained on official business.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. STECK] is necessarily detained from the Senate and that if present he would vote "yea" on this amendment.

The result was announced—yeas 43, nays 30, as follows:

YEAS—43

So Mr. McKELLAR'S amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, it has been suggested that the next amendment in my printed amendments might well go over until to-morrow morning. So I ask that it may be passed over until that time and that the following amendment may be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 26, after line 21, insert:

The word "majority" means a majority of the whole board or advisory council authorized to be appointed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, the question has been asked by one of the new Members of this Chamber, Who is this F. W. Murphy who is here in the interest of legislation intended to establish economic equality for agriculture? For the enlightenment of those who do not know, I desire to say that his home is in western Minnesota near the South Dakota State line. He is a large farm owner and operator and has been such for 25 years.

He is one of the original incorporators and ever since a stockholder in a number of cooperative farm organizations in his own county.

He is a member of the Minnesota Farm Bureau Federation.

For 10 years he was a member of the board of managers of the Minnesota State Agricultural Society and for 2 years its president.

Ever since its organization, in July, 1924, he has been chairman of the board of the American Council of Agriculture, which organization is made up of more than 50 farm organizations of the United States.

Since its organization he has been chairman of the board of the Minnesota Council of Agriculture.

He is one of the originators of the McNary-Haugen type of legislation and leader of the agricultural forces of the Northwest during the last five years sponsoring the McNary-Haugen bill.

He has spent 15 months in Washington during sessions of Congress in the last five years urging enactment of the McNary-Haugen bill.

He participated in the organization of the Corn Belt Federation of Farm Organizations, which meeting was held in Des Moines in December, 1925.

The Corn Belt federation is composed of nearly 50 farm organizations of the States of Montana, North and South Dakota, Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, Iowa, Minnesota, Illinois, Indiana, and Wisconsin. Its legislative committee is made up of 21 members. He has acted as chairman of this legislative committee since the Corn Belt federation was organized, and as such has been in active charge in behalf of the Corn Belt federation work here in Washington for the enactment of the McNary-Haugen bill.

He has not had one cent of compensation from any source for all of the services he has performed for agriculture.

He is not one of the District of Columbia farmers; in fact, I wish to say he has been our inspiration. He is one of the few persons who have spent their time and effort in Washington working for this measure. He has done it without salary and without compensation. He has done it for the good of the cause.

I submit for the RECORD a list of the farm organizations which Mr. Murphy represents.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the list will be printed in the RECORD.

The list is as follows:

The Corn Belt Federation of Farm Organizations includes 49 farm organizations of the States of Oklahoma, Kansas, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, Idaho, Washington, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, Illinois, and Indiana.

The president of the federation is Mr. William Hirth, Columbia, Mo.

The secretary of the federation is Mr. A. W. Ricker, St. Paul, Minn.

The federation's legislative committee of 21 members, of which Mr. F. W. Murphy is the chairman, has had charge of the campaign from those States for the McNary-Haugen bill. It is comprehensively representative of organized agriculture in the above States. The legislative committee's membership is:

F. W. Murphy, Wheaton, Minn., chairman of board American Council of Agriculture.

James Manahan, St. Paul, Minn., Equity Cooperative Exchange.

Ralph Snyder, Manhattan, Kans., president Kansas Farm Bureau.

C. W. Huff, Salina, Kans., president Kansas Farmers' Union.

Thomas Cashman, Owatonna, Minn., executive board, Minnesota Farm Bureau Federation.

Charles E. Hearst, Des Moines, Iowa, president Iowa Farm Bureau Federation.

H. G. Keeny, Omaha, Nebr., president Nebraska Farmers' Union.

Milo Reno, Des Moines, Iowa, president Iowa Farm Bureau Federation.

William Hirth, Columbia, Mo., president Missouri Farmers' Association.

William Settle, Indianapolis, Ind., president Indiana Farm Bureau Federation.

C. B. Steward, Lincoln, Nebr., secretary Nebraska Farm Bureau Federation.

C. N. Croes, Aberdeen, S. Dak., president South Dakota Wheat Growers' Association.

James O'Shea, Roberts, Mont., president Montana Farmers' Union.

C. C. Talbott, Forbes, N. Dak., president North Dakota Farmers' Union.

John Simpson, Oklahoma City, Okla., president Oklahoma Farmers' Union.

Charles Weller Mitchell, S. Dak., chairman South Dakota Agricultural Equity Commission.

E. E. Kennedy, Pontiac, Ill., secretary Illinois Farmers' Union.

G. P. Mix, Moscow, Idaho, president Idaho Export Commission League.

Joe Plummer, Akron, Colo., Colorado Wheat Growers' Association.

J. C. Schumann, Watertown, Wis.

Walter J. Robinson, Spokane, Wash., president Northwest Wheat Growers' Association.

In addition to the above organizations the following are also some of the other members of the federation:

North Dakota Wheat Growers' Association.
Farmers' Union of South Dakota.
Farm Bureau of South Dakota.
South Dakota Equality Commission.
Farmers' Union Terminal Association of Minnesota.
Farmers' Union Shipping Association of Illinois.
Illinois Farmers' Union.
Minnesota Council of Agriculture.
South Dakota Council of Agriculture.
Minnesota Wheat Growers' Association.
National Corn Growers' Association.
American Council of Agriculture.

Mr. NORBECK. The question has also been asked, Who is Chester Davis that is here "lobbying" for the farmers? I think the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] answered that question very well. I may supplement what he said by stating that Mr. Davis was at one time a resident of the same town in South Dakota that is my home. I have known him for a good many years and have every confidence in his ability, good judgment, and high purposes. He is alert and capable. His ability is being recognized even by the opposition, who are irritated by his activities.

I wish to state further that a Senator on the floor yesterday referred to Mr. Peek as a man who claims to be a leader in this movement. That is an error. It is, in fact, a false charge. Mr. Peek has never claimed to be a leader. He just claims to be a soldier in the ranks. He works intelligently and actively for this measure that is calculated to give the Northwest a square deal. Why should a Northwest Senator attack him? His service has been unselfish and of a high quality.

The fact that he was at one time in the business of manufacturing farm machinery only adds to his better understanding of the agricultural inequality.

The charge that he has delayed the vote on this bill is ridiculous, as was shown by the reply of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] yesterday. I should like to have printed in the RECORD a letter from Mr. Peek to myself giving considerable information; second, a letter from Governor Hammill, of Iowa, to Mr. Peek, and a copy of the law appropriating money for the support of the organization. Next, a letter dated December 9, 1927, from the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] to Mr. Peek and the reply by Mr. Peek to the Senator from North Dakota.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NORTH CENTRAL STATES AGRICULTURAL CONFERENCE,
EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF TWENTY-TWO,
Washington, D. C., April 11, 1928.

Hon. PETER NORBECK,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR NORBECK: The Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] made some misleading and erroneous statements in his remarks yesterday, April 10, in connection with farm legislation and my own activities to which I direct your attention, in the hope that you will see that the RECORD is kept clear.

(1) The Senator says I am a banker and represent the bankers of 11 States.

I am not a banker in any sense, except that I own 10 shares of stock in a city banking institution, nor do I represent any banker or any bankers' association except as they may be a part of the commonwealth of the North Central States. I am not now and I have not been engaged in any active business since the spring of 1924, except farming. I own four farms, am operating two of them and financing operations of the other two, one exclusively and the other partially. My position was made clear by your remarks on April 5, when in introducing into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the memorandum to which the Senator of Iowa refers, you said (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 5926), in speaking of my committee:

"This conference was organized at a meeting of governors or delegates from the 12 North Central States called by Gov. John Hammill, of Iowa, in January, 1926. The purpose of the committee is to back organized agriculture in its effort to secure economic equality with industry."

It seems strange to me that the Senator did not refer in his remarks to the action of the farm organizations' support of the McNary bill, particularly the action of the Corn Belt committee in Des Moines last week in indorsing it.

The public will readily understand the difference between backing the activities of the farm organizations in their effort to secure legislation and "claiming" to be the leader of the farm movement in the United States.

The extent to which my committee is supported by the people of the State of Iowa is indicated by the action of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa March 14, 1928, in appropriating $5,000 for the use of the committee for the purpose of securing agricultural relief and equality. (Letter from Governor Hammill of March 14, 1928, and copy of resolution adopted attached.)

The Senator said, "He claims to be the leader of the farm movement in the United States at this time." I have not claimed to be the leader of the farm movement, nor have I claimed to represent any farm organizations.

(2) In reference to the unwarranted charge that I am more interested in the political fortunes of some individuals than I am in farm relief, I inclose a letter from Senator FRAZIER, dated December 9, 1927, with copy of my reply on December 14, 1927, which explained my position at that time and now. (Correspondence attached.)

(3) I have never interviewed the Senator from Iowa, any other Senator, or any citizen of the United States on behalf of the candidacy of any individual of either party. I have discussed political possibilities with many people, including a number in both parties who have been mentioned in connection with the 1928 campaign. These discussions invariably have been initiated by some one else rather than by me.

As to his charge that I am the campaign manager for the Vice President, that is not only untrue but such a situation has never been discussed by anyone so far as I know.

(4) In connection with Mr. Hoover's activities, I repeat that on account of them he is more responsible for the continued depression in agriculture than any other man in the Nation, because he has been the agricultural advisor of the last two administrations, has refused to support the program of the farmers, and has brought forth no constructive proposals of his own, although the probable effects of a laissez faire attitude were called to his attention in January, 1922.

(5) As to how my statement of April 3 came to appear in the RECORD, I quote my memorandum to you of April 5, 1928, which explains my action and the reasons for it:

"This memorandum was prepared upon request of the late Senator Willis, who told Mr. Murphy and me some three weeks ago that these pamphlets were being widely distributed in Ohio and that he desired to know the facts in connection with Mr. Hoover's record as a friend to the farmer, as the farm organizations knew them.

"I have since learned that in addition to the two pamphlets to which this memorandum is addressed other pamphlets and propaganda material on behalf of Mr. Hoover is being widely distributed. I have concluded, therefore, to pass on the memorandum to you in the hope that you will see that it is placed in the RECORD that the country may know the truth, as distinguished from the representations being made in Mr. Hoover's behalf, in connection with his record as a friend of the farmer."

"Respectfully,
Sincerely yours,
GEORGE N. PEEK."

GEORGE N. PEEK.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, STATE OF IOWA,
Des Moines, March 14, 1928.

Mr. GEORGE N. PEEK, Chicago, Ill.

MY DEAR PEEK: Inclosed herein I hand you copy of bill which was passed by the Iowa Legislature to-day, which was prepared and its passage requested by me. Hope you are progressing with this committee in a manner that will secure results. If I can be of further service, call upon me.

Cordially,

JOHN HAMMILL, Governor.

An act to appropriate a fund for the expenses of the Committee of Twenty-two (22) organized and created under call of Hon. John Hammill, Governor of Iowa, to carry on the endeavor to procure agricultural relief and equality.

Be it enacted by General Assembly of the State of Iowa—

SECTION 1. Appropriation. There is hereby appropriated to the chairman and treasurer of the Committee of Twenty-two, organized and created at Des Moines, Iowa, under call of the Hon. John Hammill, Governor of Iowa, for the purpose of procuring agricultural relief and equality, out of funds not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be deemed necessary to pay the expenses of said committee in carrying on their work and endeavor to procure agricultural equality and relief. All unexpended balances shall revert to the State. An itemized report of all expenditures shall be made to the Governor of the State of Iowa by the chairman and treasurer of said committee, showing the expenses incurred by it, and said report shall be placed on file with the secretary of state.

SEC. 2. This act being deemed of immediate importance shall be in force from and after its publication in the Elkader Register, a newspaper published in Elkader, Iowa, and the Des Moines Register, a newspaper published in Des Moines, Iowa.

CLEM F. KIMBALL,
President of the Senate.
HOWARD A. MATHEWS,
Speaker pro tempore of the House.

I hereby certify that this bill originated in the senate and is known as senate file No. 11, special session.

WALTER H. BEAM,
Secretary of the Senate.

Approved March 14, 1928.

JOHN HAMMILL, Governor.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICES AND POST ROADS,
December 9, 1927.

Hon. GEORGE N. PEEK,
Chairman Agricultural Conference,
1133 Investment Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PEEK: I am very much interested, as you know, in seeing worthwhile farm relief legislation passed at this session. I am convinced, too, that the people of my section of the country are insistent upon the equalization plan remaining in the McNary-Haugen bill and also upon the passage of the bill.

Persistent rumors have come to me that you are more interested in pushing some of the presidential candidates than you are in farm relief and that you are using farm legislation as a means to that end. Now, I am frank in this statement because I feel that those rumors are likely to be a hindrance to the passage of favorable farm legislation.

I would appreciate a frank statement from you in regard to this story which is being circulated.

Assuring you of my best wishes, I am,

Yours truly,

LYNN J. FRAZIER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 14, 1927.

Hon. LYNN J. FRAZIER,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR FRAZIER: In reply to your letter of December 9 I want you to know that I appreciate your frankness in asking me to comment on the rumor reported to you that I am more interested in pushing some of the presidential candidates than I am in farm relief. I do not know where such rumors originate, but I do know that whoever is responsible for them has not acquainted himself with the simple facts or else deliberately misstates them.

First, I wish to say that in my judgment effective relief for agriculture is more important to the Nation than is the political success of any individual or of any political party. I am confident that the record of my activity in trying to advance agricultural equality demonstrates that I have been guided by that principle.

Your inquiry justifies a brief review of that record. Since 1921, when it first became apparent that unless something was done the burden of postwar deflation would be thrust on the farmers, I have devoted most of my thought and effort to the problem of securing a national policy that would protect and stabilize agriculture on a basis of equality with other industries. Since 1924 I have been engaged in no other business.

Up to that time, with the exception of the war period, when I served on the War Industries Board, I was in the farm-implement business. The farmer was my only customer. When my business fell off because the farmer was "going broke" and could not buy I first set to work to study the cause; then to see if something could not be done about it.

In the fall of 1921 I presented certain conclusions and recommendations, which subsequently became the basis for the first McNary-Haugen bill, to officers of the American Farm Bureau Federation. In January, 1922, I published this material in the pamphlet Equality for Agriculture, which was widely circulated. At that time I presented the recommendation to Secretary of Agriculture Henry C. Wallace and Sidney Anderson, chairman of the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, indirectly to President Harding and Secretary Hoover and later directly to President Coolidge. In the Harding agricultural conference in 1922 I assisted in getting a resolution adopted calling on Congress and the President to take steps immediately to restore the fair exchange value of the farmers' dollar. Early in 1924, while the first McNary-Haugen bill was under consideration in the House Committee on Agriculture, I came to Washington at the request of some of the farm leaders and of Secretary Wallace to assist in getting the measure before the Committee on Agriculture in the House, and I have been in Washington during every succeeding session of Congress working to secure the necessary legislation.

From the beginning I have insisted that this is an economic, not a political, question, and opposed having farm relief become the football of partisan politics. The policy of the American Council of Agriculture, formed at the St. Paul mass meeting in July, 1924, after the defeat of the first McNary-Haugen bill in the House, was to support Members of Congress who had supported the measure and to oppose those who had voted against it, regardless of party. I was made president of this organization. It took no stand in the presidential campaign of that year, because the platform declarations on which the three candidates ran were all satisfactory.

That the campaign for farm relief has been conducted without regard to party lines is indicated by the vote which passed the McNary-Haugen bill in the Sixty-ninth Congress. In the House as well as in the Senate 57 per cent of the voting Democrats and 52 per cent of the voting Republicans supported the measure, while some of the leaders in each party opposed it.

Political significance was given to farm relief when President Coolidge, in plain disregard of his party platform, vetoed the measure to help restore agricultural equality which Congress had adopted after three years of study and debate. I am sure you will agree with me that this political aspect has not been due to any of the activities of the farm groups. Until the delivery of the veto message, in spite of the reports that were current in Washington, I clung to the hope that President Coolidge would approve the bill.

Farm legislation is one of the important tasks before the present Congress. I assure you that I would be most happy if all forces would join in passing an effective measure which addressed the problem adequately, thus removing the question from consideration in 1928. But I want to say most emphatically that I am not in favor of accepting any measure which does not embody the essential features necessary to permanent farm relief, nor do I minimize the importance of having an administration that is sympathetic with agriculture, and is courageous enough to work for its rehabilitation. But my primary effort, as I am sure the record I have briefly reviewed for you proves, has been and will be to secure legislation under which agriculture can organize and hold its own in our organized society.

On the question of presidential candidates, I do not believe my own attitude differs at all from that of the many leaders of organized agriculture with whom I come in contact. In either party the best man for agriculture who has a chance to secure the nomination should have the farm support, and when it comes to a choice between party candidates the same rule should apply, regardless of party labels. While I do not flatter myself that my personal preference is of public importance, I am glad to assure you that the principles I have stated in this paragraph are the ones that will determine my own choice in 1928.

I am inclosing an article from the Illinois edition of the Bureau Farmer of the current month, which is a reprint of a paper presented by me last August before the general conference of the Institute of Politics at Williamstown, Mass., on the subject of the "Political aspects of the farm question."

If you are interested in discussing this subject further with me, particularly with regard to my personal views and appraisal of candidates that are prominently mentioned for the Presidency, I shall be glad to meet you at any time for that purpose.

Assuring you of my high esteem and best wishes, I am

Yours sincerely,

GEORGE N. PEEK.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, on yesterday it was charged on the floor of the Senate that the pending bill was in the interest of certain Republican candidates for the Presidency. I wish to say about that that I am not at all interested as to whether or not the bill is in the interest of any candidate, but frankly I do not believe that it is.

In the first place, I do not think it makes any difference who those on the other side of the Chamber nominate for President in the coming campaign, because I think he will unquestionably be defeated; but I am rather afraid that an impression may have been created from the argument that took place that the support of the McNary-Haugen bill was mainly limited to a number of individuals with no connection with farm organizations or with cooperatives in the United States. I am sure that is not correct.

Something was said about Chester Davis, whom he represented, and what his interest in agriculture had been. I explained that to some extent on yesterday, but I wish to say further that my information is that Mr. Davis since he left Montana has been representing farm organizations in the Middle West; that they have created what they call an agricultural service, and that Mr. Davis represents that agricultural service here in the city of Washington.

An impression was left as a result of the Senate debate yesterday afternoon that the support of the McNary-Haugen bill in Washington is mainly represented by a limited number of individuals with no connection with the farm organizations and cooperatives of the United States. This is not correct.

Over a year ago a number of the farm organizations and cooperative associations established an agricultural service to work for the adoption of the principles embodied in the McNary-Haugen bill. Chester C. Davis is in charge of the Washington and Chicago offices of this agricultural service. It is directed by the committee for agricultural service, of which Dr. B. W. Kilgore, chairman of the legislative committee of the American Cotton Growers Exchange, is the treasurer. The organizations which are represented in this agricultural service and which are contributing to its support are—

Central States Soft Wheat Growers Association.
Mississippi Staple Cotton Growers Cooperative.
Missouri Farmers Association.
Burley Tobacco Growers.
Indiana Farm Bureau Federation.
Executive Committee of Twenty-two.
North Carolina Cotton Growers Cooperative.
Arizona Pima Cotton Growers Cooperative.
Arkansas Cotton Growers Association.
Texas Farm Bureau Cotton Association.
Evansville Producers Association, Indiana.
Mississippi Farm Bureau Cotton Association.
Tennessee Cotton Growers Association.
Illinois Agricultural Association.

These organizations, through their agricultural service, are cooperating with other National and State farm organizations in seeking this legislation. The American Farm Bureau Federation has indorsed and worked for this legislation for several years. Its president, S. H. Thompson, and its Washington representative, Chester H. Gray, are in Washington actively working for this legislation at the present time.

The Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America, known as the National Farmers' Union, specifically indorsed this legislation at its last national convention in Des Moines, Iowa, last November. Many other organizations of the farmers not directly represented by either of national farm organizations or agricultural service have indorsed and are supporting this legislation.

The North Central States Agricultural Conference, of whose Executive Committee of Twenty-two George N. Peek is the chairman, is an organization largely representing the business interests of the North Central States whose program is to support the farm organizations in their drive for agricultural equality.

Mr. Frank Murphy, the other gentleman who was mentioned, is chairman of the legislative committee of the Corn Belt Federation of Farm Organizations, which is composed of the farm organizations, the names of which organizations I ask may be inserted in the RECORD as part of my remarks without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The list referred to is as follows:

The Missouri Farm Association, the National Producers' Alliance, the Iowa Farmers' Union, the Iowa Farm Bureau, the Iowa State Grange, the Iowa Threshermen's Association, the Ottumwa Iowa Dairy Marketing Association, the Nebraska Farmers' Union, the Kansas Farmers' Union, the Kansas Farm Bureau, the Minnesota Farmers' Union, the Minnesota Farm Bureau, the Minnesota Wheat Growers, the South Dakota Producers' Alliance, the South Dakota Wheat Growers' Association, the South Dakota Farmers' Union, the North Dakota Farmers' Union, the North Dakota Wheat Growers' Association, the Oklahoma Farmers' Union, the Indiana Farm Bureau, the Central States Soft Wheat Growers' Association, the Chicago Milk Producers' Association, the Illinois Farmers' Union, the Wisconsin Cooperative Creamery Association, the Wisconsin Farm Bureau, the Equity Cooperative Exchange, the Farmers' Union Terminal Association, the South St. Paul Farmers' Union Livestock Commission House, the Chicago Farmers' Union Livestock Commission House, the Sioux City Farmers' Union Livestock Commission House, the Kansas City Farmers' Union Livestock Commission House, the Omaha Farmers' Union Livestock Commission House, the American Council of Agriculture, the Minnesota Council of Agriculture, the Montana Farmers' Union, and the National Corn Growers' Association.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I do not intend to take up more of the time of the Senate, except to say that I am heartily in favor of the bill because of the fact that I feel that after the organized farmers of the United States have come here to Washington, and have had their economists and lawyers prepare this bill, and it has been thrashed out, we at least ought to give it a trial. Everybody in the United States, every business organization, every banker, knows that the agricultural situation in the Middle West and in the West is very bad. They know what suffering the farmers have undergone throughout the country during the last few years—in fact, since the deflation period—and nobody has offered any particular remedy excepting this one, which the farmers have presented to this Congress.

It has been suggested that certain portions of the measure are unconstitutional. I am not entirely satisfied that some parts of it may not be unconstitutional, but I am perfectly willing to let the question be submitted to the courts and to let the Supreme Court of the United States pass upon the constitutional questions involved. I sincerely hope and trust that the measure will pass.

Mr. COPELAND obtained the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD my revised amendment in reference to the appointment of the advisory council, and right underneath it the revised amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] to the amendment, so that the Senate may have the two amendments before it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendments referred to are as follows:

[By Mr. McKELLAR]

On page 5 strike out line 17 and down through the period in line 1 on page 6 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 4. (a) Whenever the board determines that any agricultural commodity may thereafter require stabilization by the board through marketing agreements authorized by this act, or whenever the cooperative associations or other organizations representative of the producers of the commodity shall apply to the board for the creation and appointment of the advisory council for such commodity, then the board shall notify the President of such determination or application. The President shall thereupon create an advisory council for the commodity. The advisory council shall be composed of seven members, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. No individual shall be eligible for appointment to a commodity advisory council unless he resides in the region in which the commodity is principally grown, and is a producer of the commodity or interested in the production or marketing of such commodity. Prior to the making of any appointment to a commodity advisory council the board shall transmit to the President for his consideration lists of individuals qualified for appointment, to be submitted to the board by cooperative associations or other organizations representative of the producers of the commodity. The term of office of a member of any commodity advisory council shall be two years. In the event of a vacancy occurring, the President shall fill such vacancy in the same manner as the originally appointed member, and, should Congress not be in session, such appointee shall hold office until 20 days after the convening of the next session of Congress."

[McKellar amendment for section 4 (a) as proposed to be amended by Caraway amendment]

SEC. 4. (a) Whenever the board determines that any agricultural commodity may thereafter require stabilization by the board through marketing agreements authorized by this act, or whenever the cooperative associations or other organizations representative of the producers of the commodity shall so decide, the board shall create and appoint an advisory council for such commodity. The advisory council shall be composed of seven members, to be appointed by the board from a list submitted to the board by cooperative associations or other organizations representative of the producers of the commodity. In the event of a vacancy occurring, the board shall fill such vacancy in the same manner as the original appointment.

The power to remove a member of the advisory council rests with the board, but may be exercised only with the consent of the cooperative association or other organizations representative of the producers of the commodity for which he was appointed.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, yesterday we had some discussion about fresh fruits and vegetables. The day before I had offered an amendment which was adopted by the Senate, and yesterday the Senator from West Virginia had that action set aside, and the Senate adopted another amendment which excluded fruits and vegetables from the application of the equalization fee and marketing agreements. I said nothing in opposition yesterday because I wanted to know how the fresh fruit and vegetable producers and marketers might feel about that amendment. I find that there is perfect unanimity in opposition to the amendment which was adopted yesterday; and my purpose in rising at this moment is to suggest a modification of the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia. His amendment is as follows:

The provisions of this bill relative to marketing agreements and equalization fees shall not be construed to apply to fresh fruits or vegetables.

I ask that that be amended to read:

The provisions of this bill shall not be construed to apply to fresh fruits or vegetables.

I am suggesting this amendment——

Mr. BORAH. I could not hear the last statement of the Senator as to the amendment which he offers.

Mr. COPELAND. I am asking that the language which we decided upon yesterday be changed.

Mr. BORAH. To what extent?

Mr. COPELAND. So as to omit the reference to marketing agreements and equalization fees, and to read as follows:

The provisions of this bill shall not be construed to apply to fresh fruits or vegetables.

That will exclude its application to potatoes from the State of Idaho and to fresh fruits and vegetables from every other portion of the country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest that the amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from New York will require unanimous consent. A motion to reconsider the previous amendment has been made and carried and that amendment has been amended. Under the rule only one motion to reconsider may be entertained.

Mr. COPELAND. I sought to avoid the parliamentary situation by not asking for a reconsideration, but to ask that the amendment which is now a part of the bill before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole shall be modified by omitting certain language which was adopted yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will still be open to amendment when the bill reaches the Senate.

Mr. COPELAND. I realize that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If unanimous consent is now refused the Senator to offer the amendment, it may be offered in the Senate.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, it seems to me that unanimous consent should be granted. Some of us are very much interested in the question of fruits and vegetables as related to this bill. Had it been known that it was to be discussed here yesterday I would have been here to discuss it, but it was adopted after a very brief discussion.

I think we should return to it by unanimous consent in order that the whole matter may be discussed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, unanimous consent can not now be obtained to undo what was done yesterday.

Mr. DILL. The Senator from West Virginia should not take that attitude. He ought to be fair in this matter. I am sure he does not want to do anybody an injustice. The boxed-apple industry in the Northwest is of tremendous importance, and those engaged in it are as much interested in the proposed legislation as is anybody else.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be open to amendment when it comes out of the Committee of the Whole into the Senate.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. I simply desire to say that I did not object to the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia for the reason that I supposed it was the identical amendment notice of which had been given by the Senator from New York. Within the hour I have had a telegram from the Governor of Virginia, who is perhaps the greatest orchardist in the United States, protesting very vigorously against the amendment as adopted, and urging that the amendment suggested by the Senator from New York be agreed to. If it may not be done by unanimous consent, it certainly should be done when the bill gets into the Senate.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator for just a moment——

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. I should like to say that I, too, have received to-day quite a number of letters protesting against that amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. I understand, from the telegrams and information I have received, that the apple people of Virginia desire to be excluded entirely from the operations of this bill.

Mr. DILL. I want to say to the Senator, if I may, that the apple industry of the West wants to be excluded; and I hope the Senator from West Virginia will permit the matter to be discussed here. Of course, it can be taken up later.

Mr. SWANSON. I suppose the apple and fruit industry of West Virginia is also large. I do not know to what extent the Senator from West Virginia is desirous of having this bill operative on the fruit industry and apple industry of West Virginia. As I understand, the apple and fruit industry of Virginia desires to be exonerated and completely eliminated from the bill. I hope the Senator will consent to unanimous consent being granted for that to be done at this time.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. NEELY. Permit me to say to both of the Senators from Virginia that the apple growers and vegetable raisers of West Virginia at first objected to being included in this bill because they did not want to bear the expense of providing storage facilities for their perishable and nonstorable products. But upon investigation I learned that many of the fruit growers and vegetable raisers desired to obtain the benefits of the bill provided they could be relieved of the burdens of the equalization fees and the exactions of the marketing agreements. By adopting my amendment yesterday the Senate accomplished just what I had been informed that my apple-growing constituency desired.

If the amendment is stricken from the bill, every fruit grower and vegetable raiser in the country will thereby be excluded from every benefit provided by the pending measure.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if I am barred by the parliamentary situation from any action at this time, I give notice that in the Senate I shall renew this motion.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I withdraw my objection to the Senator's unanimous-consent request in order that this matter may be finally settled before the Senate adjourns for the day.

Mr. COPELAND. I think that is very generous on the part of the Senator from West Virginia.

I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia was adopted on yesterday be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote whereby the amendment was adopted will be reconsidered. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. Now, Mr. President, I ask that the language be changed, and that at the proper place in the bill this language be inserted:

The provisions of this bill shall not be construed to apply to fresh fruits or vegetables.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator kindly read the language of the bill to us again?

Mr. COPELAND. I am proposing to amend the bill by adding in the general definitions on page 26 the following:

As used in this act, the words "agricultural commodity" mean an agricultural commodity which is not a fruit or a vegetable.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that is practically the same form in which the Senator offered the amendment a few days ago; is it not?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes, sir; the same form.

Mr. McNARY. It takes fruits and vegetables entirely without the operation of any of the provisions of the bill?

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from New York why he would not be willing to enjoy some of the benefits of this bill, if his people applied for them and petitioned for them, without being compelled to put up the taxes or being bound by the marketing agreements? In other words, the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia apparently provides that the bill shall not apply to fruits and vegetables with respect to the equalization fee and with respect to the marketing provisions of the bill; and that leaves it open to them, if they want to get the benefits of the bill—for instance, loans under the bill—to apply for them. What harm can that bring to the fruit and vegetable growers?

Mr. COPELAND. In the first place, it would not be fair to the other people. In the next place, the fruit and vegetable people are in an entirely different position from the ordinary farmer. The orchards and the gardens are entirely different; and these persons who produce fruits and vegetables have had no education in this matter and are not interested in it. They have not thought about it. It means new market arrangements.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the fruit growers of Virginia have, and for a long time have had, their own organization. They have their own cold-storage plants. They have their own marketing facilities. They are perfectly independent of anything of this sort. They do not want their business interfered with by the Federal Government in any way, shape, or form. As the Senator from New York has so aptly said, they are not willing to occupy the humiliating position of undertaking to avail themselves of any advantages of legislation without accepting the responsibilities, and they want neither.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I venture to say that by to-morrow the Senator from Florida will have a sheaf of telegrams from his State. The reason why I had so many to-day was because yesterday, when this action was taken, in order that I might test out the sentiment of the raisers of fruits and vegetables, I wired each one of these persons who protested against the bill, and I had a reply from every single one saying, "We do not want to be associated with this bill in any way whatever. We are opposed to it lock, stock, and barrel."

That is the sentiment expressed in the telegrams which I have received. In view of their unwillingness to be included, they ought not to be included. In the next place, we have perishable products to deal with, entirely different from the products of the farm, the grains, and the cotton from the South. They are not products that can be dealt with in the same way; and I am quite satisfied that we ought not to impose upon them any responsibilities or obligations under this bill.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I have had not only telegrams but a great many letters from the apple growers of the State of Washington; and these letters are not representative merely of one or two individuals but they represent large numbers, hundreds and hundreds of growers, and they insist that they want the apple industry to have no connection whatever with this marketing system. They have built up their own marketing system. They have built up their own plan of storing their fruits. The boxed-apple industry is in a stable condition, and we do not want the apple business of the Northwest in any way handled by any board or under legislation of this kind.

I hope the amendment of the Senator from New York will be agreed to.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, were the telegrams that the Senator from New York received in protest against my amendment from fruit growers who would be benefited by it or from certain commission merchants who are believed to be hostile to the entire bill?

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from West Virginia that about two weeks ago I received telegrams from fruit growers' organizations in my State asking me to have the McNary-Haugen bill amended so that it would not include apples. Then I received one telegram urging that they be left in the bill. I wired back to both, those who had wired me for fruit being included and those who had wired against it, and said, "I wish you would give me reasons for your demand."

I later received letters written after meetings of apple growers had been held, and they are unanimous in their demand that the apple industry shall not be included under the terms of this bill, whether the equalization fee applies or whether it does not. They have their own marketing organization. They have their own system of handling fruit. They do not want any Federal board interfering with the handling of fruit and vegetables in the Northwest.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, let me again warn those whose constituents grow fruit and raise vegetables that by voting for the pending amendment they will aid in depriving their people of benefits of great value.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the opinion of the Chair, the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia is now before the Senate. If that is voted down, then the amendment of the Senator from New York will be voted upon.

Mr. COPELAND. My motion was really to reconsider the vote by which we adopted the Senator's amendment. Now I am moving to amend that amendment. Would that be proper now?

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senate has reconsidered the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia was adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question comes up on reconsideration of the Neely amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Now the Senator from New York wishes to amend that amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, as I understood the situation, the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] had been agreed to. Then the Senator from West Virginia moved to reconsider, and that motion was agreed to; and then the Senator from West Virginia substituted his amendment for the amendment that had been adopted, offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. NEELY. That is exactly right.

Mr. CURTIS. That is as I understand the situation.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that is absolutely correct.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from New York is an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia. After the reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia was agreed to, the Senator from New York moved to strike out certain words from the amendment, and the question now is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment. The amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia was as follows:

The provisions of this bill relative to marketing agreements and equalization fees shall not be construed to apply to fresh fruits and vegetables.

The vote by which that amendment was agreed to was reconsidered. Then the Senator from New York moved to strike out the words "relative to marketing agreements and equalization fees," so that it would read:

That the provisions of this bill shall not be construed to apply to fresh fruits and vegetables.

That is the situation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] to the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY].

On a division, the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I ask unanimous consent that there may be a reprint of the bill showing the amendments already agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, April 12, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, April 11, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

This day is for us, our Heavenly Father. What shall we give it? So often we make this life of ours vague, difficult, and mysterious. We ask Thee to quicken every pulse in us to aspire that we may justly claim the glorious right to live. Help us to guard its hours as valued treasures and give to it a good name, which is above every other gift. It is not just what we do that constitutes the best benefactions to our fellow citizens, but what we are. Pour into our lives Thy Holy Spirit and bless us with the deepest calm and courage. If sorrow is our portion, may we keep the faith; if temptation is beckoning, may we keep the faith; if the skies are forbidding and the pathway is hard, may we keep the faith; when all truth seems dead or lost, O may we keep the faith. When the evening comes and we look back across the hours between dawn and dark, bless us with this satisfaction, because of some good word or work the world is better that I have lived to-day. In the blessed name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the committees.

OAKLAND HARBOR, CALIF.

The Clerk called the committees; and when the Committee on Rivers and Harbors was reached—

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Joint Resolution 244, authorizing a modification of the adopted project for Oakland Harbor, Calif., and I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read the House joint resolution, as follows:

House Joint Resolution 244

Resolved, etc., That the project adopted in the river and harbor act of January 21, 1927, for the improvement of Oakland Harbor, Calif., is hereby so modified as to eliminate the requirement that local interests "shall alter or replace the bridges over the tidal canal, when, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, such alteration or replacement is necessary in the interest of navigation, and thereafter operate and maintain them."

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the project adopted in the river and harbor act approved June 21, 1927, for the improvement of Oakland Harbor, Calif., is hereby so modified as to provide that the requirement 'that local interests shall alter or replace the bridges over the tidal canal when, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, such alteration or replacement is necessary in the interests of navigation, and thereafter operate and maintain them,' shall apply only to that feature of the project covering the deepening of the tidal canal to 25 feet."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DEMPSEY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

UPPER MISSISSIPPI RIVER WILD LIFE AND FISH REFUGE

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up H. J. Res. 200 to amend section 10 of the act entitled "An act to establish the Upper Mississippi River Wild Life and Fish Refuge," approved June 7, 1924.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Was the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries called, or does the Committee on Agriculture have another day prior to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries?

The SPEAKER. As the Chair recollects, the situation is this: The Committee on Agriculture having had one day was not prepared on the following day and the understanding was reached in the House that that committee be passed over without prejudice, and that it might occupy the next Calendar Wednesday. The agreement is not entirely clear in the RECORD, but the Chair thinks that was the understanding of the House.

Mr. CRAMTON. The understanding is, then, that they are entitled to call before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that that was the understanding.

Mr. CRAMTON. I have no idea of pressing to the contrary, but the situation is somewhat confused; and I think it rather stresses the desirability of hereafter taking committees in their order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it was clearly the understanding in the House that the Committee on Agriculture did not lose its right to be called again before the entire list had been gone through.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am not objecting to that. The only question was whether they should get their day before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries was called.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa calls up House Joint Resolution 200. This resolution is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, this is its second calendar day the Committee on Agriculture is consuming, its last day, for it will not have another before we adjourn. Is not the gentleman going to bring up some kind of a farm relief measure?

Mr. HAUGEN. We will bring that up later.

Mr. BLANTON. Under a rule?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. When will it be—next week?

Mr. HAUGEN. We will have to see the Committee on Rules about that.

Mr. BLANTON. This bill that the gentleman now calls up is on the Union Calendar. Is this the bill that we have had up here before known as the Hawes bill creating a hunting monopoly for a few rich sportsmen?

Mr. HAUGEN. No.

Mr. BLANTON. Does it embrace game and fish—is it the game refuge bill? This is not the one that we have killed two or three times?

Mr. KINCHELOE. No; this is to establish a game and fish refuge upon the upper Mississippi River; it is not to regulate the taking of game and fish.

Mr. BLANTON. This does not in any way affect the farm boys who want to shoulder an old musket in Kentucky or Texas?

Mr. KINCHELOE. No. I know the bill that the gentleman has in mind. It is not that bill at all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, there are no copies of this resolution available at this time, and I reserve the right to object so that the gentleman from Iowa may make a statement and tell us what the joint resolution is about.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That section 10 of the act entitled "An act to establish the Upper Mississippi River Wild Life and Fish Refuge," approved June 7, 1924 (43 Stat. L., 650), as amended by joint resolution of March 4, 1925 (43 Stat. L. 1354), be, and the same is hereby amended by substituting in lieu of the proviso therein contained the following: "Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture shall not pay for any land or land and water a price, which, when added to the price of land or land and water theretofore contracted to be purchased, shall exceed an average cost of $10 per acre."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 3, after the word "acre," insert a colon and the words: "Provided further, That this provision shall not apply to any land or land and water heretofore acquired or contracted for under the provisions of this act."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa that this joint resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I should like to know more about the resolution.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, this resolution provides for acquiring certain lands in the Winnesheke bottoms in the Mississippi River. Some time ago—I think it was in the Sixty-eighth Congress—the Upper Mississippi River Wild Life Refuge was established, and Congress fixed an average price of $5 an acre which could be paid for that land. The department has acquired all of the land that it can acquire at an average price of $5 per acre, the swamp land, the pasture land, and the woodland in this refuge. It is a preserve for migratory birds, for fish, and game animals. The department can not acquire the rest of that land in that section at the price now fixed by law, and they have asked to have the average price raised to $10 an acre.

Mr. LINTHICUM. How many acres is it proposed to put in this game preserve?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this seems to be an important resolution. We can not get the facts about it at this time, and in order to give us a little time in which to acquire them, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. ANDRESEN. This is a very minor bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, it involves about $500,000, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. That will give us time to look into the matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were closed.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

LOAN OF AERONAUTICAL EQUIPMENT TO MUSEUMS

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 1822) to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer or loan aeronautical equipment to museums and educational institutions, with a House amendment, insist on the House amendment, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 1822, with a House amendment thereto, insist on the House amendment, and agree to a conference.

The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORIN] that this is agreeable to the ranking Democrat on the committee.

Mr. MORIN. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed the following conferees: Mr. JAMES, Mr. WAINWRIGHT, and Mr. GARRETT of Texas.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE JAMES A. GALLIVAN

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following order, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That Sunday, the 29th day of April, at 2 o'clock p. m., be set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public services of Hon. JAMES A. GALLIVAN, late a Representative from the State of Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the order?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the order.

The order was agreed to.

WORLD ROAD MEET

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein an article from the Washington Evening Star of April 8, 1928, entitled "Washington gets world road meet."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Evening Star, of Washington, entitled "Washington gets world road meet":

WASHINGTON GETS WORLD ROAD MEET—SIXTH CONFERENCE IN 1930 WILL MARK FIRST SUCH GATHERING IN WEST

At the invitation of the United States Government, the leading highway engineers, economists, and administrators of the world will meet in Washington in 1930 to attend the Sixth International Association of Road Congresses.

Fifty nations and five continents are expected to send hundreds of delegates to the meeting, which will be historic in that it will mark the first time the International Road Conference has assembled in the Western Hemisphere.

The resolution authorizing the invitation was signed by President Coolidge last week, having passed the Senate and the House of Representatives under the able leadership of Senator LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS, of Colorado, and Representative J. CHARLES LINTHICUM, of Maryland. Senator PHIPPS, as a member of the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, sponsored the measure in the Upper Chamber, while Representative LINTHICUM, of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, introduced the measure before the House and followed it through committee hearings. The formal invitation will be transmitted by Secretary of State Kellogg, by direction of President Coolidge, to the Permanent International Association of Road Congresses, which is the official name of the association.

TRIBUTE FROM OLD WORLD

The association had previously voted to accept the invitation if extended.

The willingness of the association officials to bring the sixth conference to the United States is held to be significant. It is recognition on the part of the Old World, with its background of centuries of highway building and highway transport, of the new order of achievement of the New World in the mass production and methods of administration of highway construction and maintenance. While highway engineering on the continent antedates the highway programs of the United States by thousands of years, the utility, science, and economic benefits of highway transportation have reached their highest fruition in this country, and it is the desire to observe these results, it is believed, that prompted the engineers of continental Europe and Asia to accept the invitation of the United States.

ONLY OFFICIAL WORLD MEET

At the fifth international conference at Milan in 1926 the delegates from the United States tentatively advanced the project of bringing the next conference to the United States. Their overtures were met with the most cordial reception. Secretary of Agriculture Jardine, in whose department is the Bureau of Public Roads, addressed the conference by letter, expressing the hope that it would prove possible for the United States to extend and the conference to accept an invitation for the next meeting to be held in Washington. The delegates from the United States at the Milan conference were Thomas H. MacDonald, Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads and chairman of the Highway Education Board; Pyke Johnson, executive director of the Pan American Federation for Highway Education; H. H. Rice, treasurer of the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce; J. N. Mackall, chairman of the State Roads Commission for Maryland; Paul D. Sargent, State highway engineer for Maine; and H. H. Kelly, European commercial attaché from the Department of Commerce.

The International Association of Road Congresses is the only world-wide official organization of highway authorities. It was organized in Paris in 1908, and congresses have since been held in Brussels in 1910, in London in 1913, in Seville in 1923, and in Milan in 1926. The sessions projected for the years during the World War were postponed.

The conference membership is comprised of 45 countries, including the United States of America; 458 collective bodies and nearly 1,500 private members, of whom more than one-third are life members. The last conference, at Milan, the first to which the United States sent an official delegation was attended by representatives from 52 nations, and the official and nonofficial delegates numbered in excess of 2,000.

The actual number of official delegates is limited to 15 from each nation.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER WILD-LIFE REFUGE

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa that House Joint Resolution 200, to amend section 10 of the act entitled "An act to establish the upper Mississippi River wild-life and fish refuge," approved June 7, 1924, be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object. That is a matter that ought to go to the committee.

The SPEAKER. This joint resolution is on the Union Calendar. The House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution, and the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. CRAMTON, will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 200, with Mr. CRAMTON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 200, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 200) to amend section 10 of the act entitled "An act to establish the upper Mississippi River wild-life and fish refuge," approved June 7, 1924.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BLANTON. The distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], from the other side of the aisle, was to help us to get a proper amendment on this bill. I notice he has been removed from the floor and now is in the chair. Will that prevent him from having that salutary amendment placed on the bill, now that he has been removed from the fighting arena, where we need him?

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the resolution be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDRESEN] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in the first place this resolution is not a resolution to charge any license fee for hunting migratory birds, such as was proposed in the Anthony Act. In the year 1924 legislation was approved by Congress establishing a wild life refuge in the upper Mississippi River. The law provided that the average price of not to exceed $5 an acre can be paid for the land acquired in the refuge. The Agricultural Department has now purchased over 16,000 acres at the average price of $5 an acre, and they find that on account of the increase in value of the land they can acquire no more land under the average price of $5 an acre, and consequently they come to Congress for additional authority to pay as much as $10 an acre as the average price. I ask to have read a letter from the department outlining the situation.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the letter referred to.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., March 10, 1928.

Hon. GILBERT N. HAUGEN,
Chairman Committee on Agriculture,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. HAUGEN: I have your letter of February 28, inclosing for consideration and comment a copy of the resolution (H. J. Res. 200) introduced by Mr. ANDRESEN, "To amend section 10 of the act entitled 'An act to establish the upper Mississippi River wild life and fish refuge,' approved June 7, 1924."

The resolution provides for increasing the average price from $5 to $10 per acre which may be paid by the department for lands purchased for the refuge.

A total of 70,543.31 acres is now under administration as a part of the refuge, of which 24,963.44 acres are public lands, 1,052.25 acres acquired by gift or cession, and 4,967.26 acres held under lease, leaving a balance of 39,560.36 acres which have been purchased or are held under contract of purchase. The actual purchases to date total 16,867.88 acres at a total land cost of $82,288.13. The land cost of the areas already acquired and those under contract for purchase is within the provision of the existing law as amended in 1925, which limits the average price to $5 per acre.

It has become evident that the average value of the land to be purchased was underestimated. The acquisition work has now proceeded to a point where it is extremely difficult to make additions by purchase without exceeding the average cost of $5 per acre. The lands suitable for refuge purposes that remain to be purchased have now been carefully examined and their values estimated by experts of the department engaged on the work who have had wide experience in that field. The factors considered in arriving at these estimates include the standing timber on the areas, their value for pasturage or the production on suitable areas of muskrats and other valuable fur-bearing animals, and the prevailing prices at which comparable areas in the vicinity have been sold in recent years. By these methods of appraisal it is found that these lands have a commercial value exceeding the $5 per acre average price allowed to be paid under existing law.

From present indications approximately 85,000 acres of suitable refuge lands remain to be acquired for completion of the project. If the proposed amendment is adopted, the department is of the opinion that it will not be necessary to ask for funds, in addition to those already authorized, for the acquisition of the desired areas to be included in the refuge. The balance of the authorized appropriation will, it is believed, be ample to provide for the purchase of the required lands at the higher average rate.

As the acquisition of land for the refuge will come to a standstill unless the proposed amendment is enacted, I sincerely trust that it will meet with the approval of your committee and be placed before Congress for enactment at the earliest possible date.

A request by this department to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry for the introduction of a similar resolution in the Senate has been submitted to the Bureau of the Budget pursuant to Circular 49 of that bureau, and under date of March 2, 1928, the Department of Agriculture was advised as follows:

"In reply I have to advise you that your proposed letter and the draft of legislation which you propose to submit therewith would not be in conflict with the financial program of the President.

"I would suggest, however, that the insertion of the words 'purchased or' after the word 'theretofore' in the last sentence of the draft might clarify the language."

The amendment suggested by the Bureau of the Budget is satisfactory to the department.

Sincerely,

W. M. JARDINE, Secretary.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDRESEN. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. What State or States is this land in?

Mr. ANDRESEN. This land is in the Winnesheke bottom. It starts south of Wabasha, Minn., and extends down the Mississippi River and affects the States of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Illinois, and Iowa.

Mr. GREEN. Does the gentleman think the land has doubled in value in four years?

Mr. ANDRESEN. The land has not doubled in value within the last four years. The original estimate put upon the land was approximately $5 an acre, an average price; but they find that in acquiring the land that there are 41,000 acres of timberland having on it several million feet of valuable timber, and they will have to pay more for that. It is hard to get good timberland with virgin timber on it at $5 an acre. If they can pay $10 as an average price, they will be able to pay as much as $15 an acre for some of the land and $5 for the rest of it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. ANDRESEN. I was answering a question.
Mr. BLANTON. I thought the gentleman was through.
Mr. ANDRESEN. By raising the average price it will give the department a chance to go in and buy the more valuable land needed in this refuge. They will be able to pay $5 or $3 for some of it and $12 or $15 for other parts. The average price of $10 will be maintained.
Mr. BLANTON. When the original bill was before Congress it was stated on the floor that much of this land was waste land, swamp land, and flowed-over land, and it would not cost much, and that on the average it would cost $5 an acre. The bill was passed on that assumption and on that assurance. This is an effort to double the price from $5 to $10.
Mr. ANDRESEN. I was not here when the original bill was passed.
Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman in view the amendment that was to be offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON]?
Mr. ANDRESEN. I accept that.
Mr. BLANTON. That amendment will be offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES]?
Mr. ANDRESEN. Yes. I will accept it.
Mr. MAPES. I have an amendment here which will give the information desired.
The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read for information the proposed amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment proposed by Mr. MAPES: Page 2, line 1, after the word "switch," strike out the remainder of the line and line 2 to and including the word "purchased."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not get that.
Mr. ANDRESEN. I will explain the purpose of the amendment. I thought I had provided for it in the last proviso to the bill. The amendment provides that the land that has already been acquired by the Government at the average price of $5 an acre shall not be taken into consideration when the new average price of $10 an acre is authorized. If they could include the land purchased before at $5 an acre, it would give them a further leeway of paying as high perhaps as $20 or more for other land. But the land to be acquired under the $10 provision is land to be acquired from now on after the passage of the act.
Mr. LAGUARDIA. Suppose the Government should condemn this land. What would be the appraised value?
Mr. ANDRESEN. I can explain the nature of the land. There are 41,220 acres of timber of varying value from perhaps $3 to $25 an acre. There are 6,000 acres of grazing land having an average value of $10.14 an acre. The timberland that I just mentioned has an average value of $14.82 an acre. The hay land has an average value of $12.66 an acre. The marshland has an average value of $2.39 an acre; the brush land has an average value of $3.11 an acre; and the lake bed or the marshland adjoining the shore has an average value of $2 an acre.
Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will it average about $10 an acre?
Mr. ANDRESEN. They feel that if they have the authority to average the land at $10 an acre, they will be able to get the entire 85,000 acres called for in the project.
Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, all of this land is contiguous.
Mr. ANDRESEN. It is nearly so.
Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman tell me this, which is more important, perhaps, than a few dollars of additional cost: Is this going to be a bird sanctuary or a bird slaughterhouse?
Mr. ANDRESEN. This is to be a permanent sanctuary for migratory birds, fish, and other game animals.
Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is hunting permitted on these lands?
Mr. ANDRESEN. Hunting is not permitted?
Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is correct, is it?
Mr. ANDRESEN. Hunting is not permitted.
Mr. LAGUARDIA. In the last Congress and in the Congress before that we were presented with an alleged game refuge bill, a bill which it was alleged provided a sanctuary for birds, when, as a matter of fact, hunting was permitted. I can not imagine of anything that is more paradoxical or more inconsistent than to have a sanctuary for birds and a refuge for game and at the same time permit hunting. May we be sure that on this particular ground there will be no hunting permitted?
Mr. ANDRESEN. There is no hunting, trapping, or fishing permitted on these lands.
Mr. CLARKE. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. ANDRESEN. Yes.
Mr. CLARKE. Is it not also a fact that through the overflow here it is the place from which we get our supplies of bass that are distributed all over the United States?
Mr. ANDRESEN. That is absolutely correct.
Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. ANDRESEN. Yes.
Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. I would like to inquire if the gentleman has any information as to whether the lands desired to be purchased under the terms of the bill are now owned by the original owners or whether they have been acquired by speculators and the price raised by those who have acquired the lands for an increased price?
Mr. ANDRESEN. I do not have the information but I have personal knowledge of some of the land that is in my State, Minnesota, along the Mississippi River, and I will say that these are small tracts which make up parts of larger farms off from the banks of the Mississippi River, and as to most of the land along the Minnesota border the fee-simple title is in the name of the men who owned the land before the project was authorized.
Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Has the price gone up by reason of the purchases made under the terms of this bill?
Mr. ANDRESEN. I do not think it has. The department has adopted this policy, that if they can not buy the land at a fair price, then they wait until the man is ready to sell. A great deal of this land—all of the land, in fact—is subject to taxation.
Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. As far as the gentleman's information goes most of the land is owned by the original owners, but a part of it may have been acquired by speculators for the purpose of getting an increased price.
Mr. ANDRESEN. That is the best information I have; but I do not see how any speculators could hope to make a great amount of money at the price of $5 or $10 an acre.
Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman will permit, in answer to the gentleman from Missouri, this is the practice, and I think it is universal: That where it is known a municipality, a State, or a government is going to acquire land, then speculators get it on an option, so that the title of record remains in the original owners and the option is all they have to sell. That is a practice which is universal.
Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. The press is carrying an item of news to the effect that lands in the bottoms along the Mississippi River are being acquired by speculators, and I thought perhaps these lands were being acquired by those who expect to get an increased price for them.
Mr. ANDRESEN. I have no knowledge of that fact.
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentlemen yield?
Mr. ANDRESEN. Yes.
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I would like to suggest to the gentleman that the price of $5 or $10 an acre is a very low price for land along this river. It must be land that is absolutely worthless for any sort of agricultural purposes, because agricultural lands in that valley are about as high in price as we can find anywhere in the country, so that this price must not be a speculator's price but a very conservative price for land in that valley.
Mr. ANDRESEN. And the department itself is not trying to secure agricultural lands.
Mr. FURLOW. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. ANDRESEN. Yes.
Mr. FURLOW. Is it not true that had an estimate been made of this land at the time the bill was originally enacted, the average price then undoubtedly would have been put at $10 an acre; but the estimates were made, so far as this particular land that it is now intended to acquire is concerned, after the passage of the act; is not that true?
Mr. ANDRESEN. That is absolutely correct. No survey was made and no effort was made to secure options on the land at a certain price before the passage of the act.
Mr. FURLOW. If the gentleman will yield further, part of this land is in my district, and I know the land and I think I can assure the gentleman from Missouri, who asked about the speculative end of it, that I know of no land that has been bought in Mississippi that was bought for speculative purposes. The idea out there is the conservation of the wild life, and the people out there, especially the sportsmen and the people of the State generally, are vitally interested in seeing this land maintained as a game refuge and as a game refuge solely.
Mr. ANDRESEN. I will say further in that connection that in the State of Minnesota interested municipalities and Izaak Walton League clubs and sportsmen's clubs have donated over 8,000 acres to be included in the refuge, without any cost to the Federal Government.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDRESEN. Yes.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Is it the gentleman's opinion that unless this amendment of the original act is enacted, the purpose of the original act of 1924 will not be effective?

Mr. ANDRESEN. Absolutely.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is willing to make that statement for the purpose of the RECORD?

Mr. ANDRESEN. Yes. The department will not be able to go ahead with the project and it will mean they will have to stop buying land and will have little scattering patches all along the Mississippi River.

Mr. ROMJUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDRESEN. Yes.

Mr. ROMJUE. In what counties does this land lie in Minnesota, the gentleman's own State?

Mr. ANDRESEN. It does not touch my district. It starts at Wabasha, Minn., which is in Wabasha County, and goes down as far as Rockford, Ill.

Mr. ROMJUE. How far is the beginning of the tract below the Canadian line?

Mr. ANDRESEN. About 300 miles.

Mr. ROMJUE. I thought it was a little farther north than that.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDRESEN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. EDWARDS. I note in the report that there are 70,543 acres now being administered as a part of the refuge, of which 24,963 are public lands. Does the Government own these public lands?

Mr. ANDRESEN. Those lands are the property of municipalities and the Government and are included in the refuge.

Mr. EDWARDS. How much of it is Federal Government land?

Mr. ANDRESEN. I could not give the gentleman that figure.

Mr. EDWARDS. They actually have now 70,543 acres with which they are carrying on this work; is that right?

Mr. ANDRESEN. No; the total project is some 82,402 acres.

Mr. EDWARDS. Just how many more acres do you propose under this bill to buy up?

Mr. ANDRESEN. The actual purchase by the department up to date is 16,867 acres.

Mr. EDWARDS. Then the Government owns, evidently, 24,963 acres which is called public land?

Mr. ANDRESEN. That is owned by the Government and by municipalities—school lands.

Mr. EDWARDS. What is the total acreage estimated to be necessary for this reservation?

Mr. ANDRESEN. The total estimate is 82,402 acres, which is to be purchased.

Mr. EDWARDS. This bill says "land and water"; how much water is being purchased under this bill?

Mr. ANDRESEN. If the gentleman has ever been in the Mississippi River bottoms he is, of course, quite aware of the fact that there are a lot of sloughs with land around these sloughs, little pockets, probably for several miles contiguous to the main channel of the Mississippi River on each side.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. ANDRESEN. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. That is what makes this land so valuable for the purpose for which the Government wishes to acquire it. It is the greatest small-mouth black-bass spawning ground in the world.

Mr. EDWARDS. I do not know that they would beat the Georgia bass.

Mr. KNUTSON. They are a different variety altogether.

Mr. EDWARDS. What I am trying to get through my mind is why we should buy up water in the Mississippi River to raise fish when we have more water in the Mississippi River than we know what to do with.

Mr. KNUTSON. It is not water at all—these spawning grounds.

Mr. ROMJUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDRESEN. Yes.

Mr. ROMJUE. It seems to me the second proviso in the bill is contradictory of the first proviso. The first proviso states, "That the Secretary of Agriculture shall not pay for any land or land and water a price, which, when added to the price of land or land and water theretofore contracted to be purchased, shall exceed an average cost of $10 per acre." That is, they may pay $10 an acre in addition to the land that has previously been contracted for.

Mr. ANDRESEN. That was the original intention of the department.

Mr. ROMJUE. The bill contains that as the first proviso, and then in the second proviso it is stated:

Provided, That this provision shall not apply to any land or land and water heretofore acquired or contracted for under the provisions of this act.

Does not this nullify the first provision of the bill? It seems to me it does.

Mr. ANDRESEN. The purpose of the committee amendment was to place the department in a position where they could not consider land already purchased and paid for. I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] will straighten out that situation.

Mr. ROMJUE. I had not heard that amendment.

Mr. ANDRESEN. I will say further, that the act of 1924 authorized the appropriation of $1,500,000 for the Mississippi River project. Of this amount, around $500,000 has been used. The rest of the land to be acquired under an average price of $10 an acre will not need extra authorization from Congress in order to acquire the land, because sufficient money has already been authorized to acquire all of the land necessary in the project. So this amendment to the act calls for no extra authorization of money from the United States Treasury.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDRESEN. I will.

Mr. ABERNETHY. How is this refuge going to be operated—under what department?

Mr. ANDRESEN. It is operated under the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Why the Department of Agriculture instead of the Department of Fisheries?

Mr. ANDRESEN. It is partly under the Bureau of Fisheries.

Mr. ABERNETHY. And the Bureau of Fisheries is under the Commerce Department?

Mr. ANDRESEN. The Bureau of Fisheries has jurisdiction over the fish and the Department of Agriculture has jurisdiction over the migratory birds.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Is this the same bill introduced by Mr. HAWES, of Missouri?

Mr. ANDRESEN. I have no knowledge about that.

Mr. ABERNETHY. All you want to do is to increase the price from $5 an acre to $10 an acre, and what is to hinder the speculators getting hold of it and running it up to $15 an acre?

Mr. ANDRESEN. If they do, I think they will have to hold the land, because I do not think the department would come back for authority to further increase the price.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Is the department sure that it can acquire the land at that price?

Mr. ANDRESEN. The department feels satisfied that they can acquire the lands at not exceeding $10 an acre.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I presume it is not necessary to ask if all the delegation of Minnesota is in favor of the bill?

Mr. ANDRESEN. I have not polled the delegation, but I presume they are.

Mr. ABERNETHY. What States are interested in this matter?

Mr. ANDRESEN. Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, Illinois, and, in fact, every State in the Mississippi Valley, because of the migratory birds that will have a refuge and resting place here. This will be a feeding ground.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDRESEN. I will.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. What is the difference between the land that has not been acquired and the land that has already been acquired at $5 an acre?

Mr. ANDRESEN. The difference is mostly in the timberland, where there is valuable tracts of timber, virgin timber in some cases and cordwood in other places, where it was impossible to get it at an average price of $5 an acre.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Was the average price of the land to be acquired more than the land already acquired?

Mr. ANDRESEN. Absolutely.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. It has not increased the price since the project was started?

Mr. ANDRESEN. No; I think the land has decreased or remained about the same.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I was wondering whether gentlemen in favor of this program will be as enthusiastic in favor of flood control when that matter comes up?

Mr. ANDRESEN. No question about it; we live in the Mississippi Valley.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be recognized. I am opposed to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If no one on the committee claims recognition in opposition to the bill, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. EDWARDS. How much time do I have?

The CHAIRMAN. One hour.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I do not think the House understands this proposition. This is not the kind of a proposition for the Congress to approve. Look at the report and you will find that there are 16,867 acres which have already been bought under the act of June 7, 1924, for $82,288. You will find in the same connection with that there are 1,052 acres as a gift, which make 17,919 acres. The public lands are given as 24,963 acres, which make a total acreage of 42,882 acres. This bill provides for land and water.

Now, how much more land and water do they want on which to raise migratory ducks and fish than 42,882 acres? They have 42,882 acres, and now they come in and ask for 85,000 more acres of land, at $10 an acre, which will be $850,000 more out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. CLARKE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS. I yield.

Mr. CLARKE. It is not a question of how much more land we want, but how much more land those who have given thought to the entire project want. The Department of Agriculture, chambers of commerce of Wisconsin and Missouri, all along the line, have been in conference and they are all back of this project. And they say they need this land, set forth in the report, and the people all over the United States will get the benefit of it. The picture you have is an immature picture while their picture is a perfect one.

Mr. EDWARDS. The picture I have in mind is not immature. I have known about fish all my life and I am familiar with migratory birds and wild life as contemplated in this bill. This proposition is not right. We are told that it is not in keeping with the condition of the Treasury and the policy of the present administration to have over $75,000,000 a year for the next two years for public highways, but here it is proposed to expend practically $1,000,000, to be dumped down in those sloughs and gulches, in the purchase of those worthless lands and waters up there which are evidently no good for anything else than to raise fish and wild game on. It is proposed to spend practically a million dollars for this in one lump sum.

Mr. ANDRESEN. As I stated in my statement, this does not take any more money out of the United States Treasury than is already authorized by law.

Mr. EDWARDS. Oh, I think the gentleman is mistaken in that. I am sure he is because if it did not take more money, you would not be here asking to be permitted to expend $5 an acre more than was established as a fair price in the first act, which became a law in 1924.

Mr. ANDRESEN. The project requires the purchase of 85,000 acres of land, roughly speaking; and if the average price is $10 an acre, that will mean $850,000. The Congress has already passed appropriation bills amounting to $500,000.

Mr. EDWARDS. For this purpose?

Mr. ANDRESEN. Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS. Without any authorization?

Mr. ANDRESEN. Oh, the authorization was approved in 1924. That will make a total of $1,350,000, or $100,000 less than the authorization in the act of 1924.

Mr. McMILLAN. But if that money has been appropriated and is not expended, it will go back into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. ANDRESEN. The money has been authorized.

Mr. McMILLAN. If it is not expended for that purpose, my understanding is that it will go back to the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. EDWARDS. The gentleman from South Carolina is correct in that, as he usually is.

Mr. KNUTSON. Has the gentleman from Georgia ever been up in that section of the country?

Mr. EDWARDS. No.

Mr. KNUTSON. We would like to have the gentleman come up there and see us some time.

Mr. EDWARDS. I would be very glad to.

Mr. McMILLAN. We have plenty of places in my section of the country for game preserves. I have a letter on my desk now submitting an offer of 30,000 acres of land for $3.50 an acre, and it is reputed to be one of the greatest game refuges in the country.

Mr. KNUTSON. We ought to work together on these propositions.

Mr. EDWARDS. We ought to work together when the proposition is right, but this proposition is not the right kind of legislation. We ought not to take the people's money out of the Treasury and put into those lands.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. We usually work together when the appropriations are going the other way, but when we want something for reclamation in our section of the country we work separately and we get nothing.

Mr. EDWARDS. I do not agree with the gentleman on that altogether. They have already had what I believe to be a sufficient sum of money to operate a fish or game preserve and refuge.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Does it not occur to the gentleman that a great many wild duck and geese come to our section of the country in the wintertime and that they use these places for resting places?

Mr. EDWARDS. I want to tell the gentleman something else that has occurred to me; they come down there and the Federal laws are generally in conflict with our State laws to such an extent we can not shoot and enjoy them.

Mr. ABERNETHY. The thing that appeals to me particularly is the idea of a game refuge. We need something of that kind. I believe it is a great move in the right direction. I think if we stand with these gentlemen on this, that when we need something of a similar nature in our section of the country we will get it. We have got to do something to take care of our game.

Mr. EDWARDS. I agree with the gentleman. We ought to have game refuges, but we ought to have a well worked out plan whereby they would be established throughout the country. You set up one in this section of the country, and if you have no refuge anywhere else the thing is a failure, and it has proven to be a failure so far. Very little actual good has resulted so far.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman knows very well that if you had a refuge in the South at a certain time of year the game would be in the North. This is where they go to breed and they return to the South in the winter.

Mr. GREEN. Right along that line I would like to say to the gentleman, showing where appropriations go, that last year my State sent over $46,000,000 in Federal taxes to the Federal Treasury.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is that all?

Mr. GREEN. And my district, a fourth of the State, contributed eleven and a half million. I think I have been 12 times to the Post Office Department and the Treasury Department begging them to give me $80,000 or $100,000 out of the $265,000,000 that we appropriated for public buildings and I have not yet the assurance that we are going to get that public building.

Mr. EDWARDS. The gentleman from Florida usually gets what he goes after and I am surprised that he has not gotten it.

Mr. FURLOW. The gentleman from Georgia states that he is in favor of these game refuges?

Mr. EDWARDS. If they are worked out well, through an organized system, and if they do not cost too much.

Mr. FURLOW. Here we have a scheme that was worked out in 1924, and we have been acquiring this land since the passage of this act.

Mr. EDWARDS. Only in this one place.

Mr. FURLOW. We have acquired land here and there within this area. Now, we are going to defeat the entire purpose of this program if within this area we leave unpurchased a spot here and another spot there. For example, if a man has 160 acres and there is an adjoining 160 acres that can not be acquired, that will prevent the refuge from being successful.

Mr. EDWARDS. I think we should either delay this legislation or defeat it, and then work out a program whereby we can establish game refuges all over the country where needed. If you establish this one up in that region, the Canadians will get more benefit from it than will the people of the United States.

Mr. MOREHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS. Yes.

Mr. MOREHEAD. There is no evidence here that the land is owned by private corporations. There would be no way of keeping them out if there were any there, and they would have hunting privileges there. I am very much opposed to allowing hunting on any sanctuary or game preserve. I have been up in that country and I know the section thoroughly. I go up there fishing. I think the price here is exorbitant.

Mr. EDWARDS. I, too, think it is exorbitant.

Mr. MOREHEAD. I think if we take it over at all, we ought to have an option on the entire body of land, so that there will not be exorbitant prices charged to complete the purchase of the entire tract.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. This is called a game sanctuary?

Mr. EDWARDS. That is what it is termed.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is hunting or fishing permitted in that sanctuary?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No. It is not permitted under the law.

Mr. KNUTSON. At no time. This is a closed reservation for wild life.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is what I wished to ascertain, because we have been having bills—one is now pending in the Senate, I think—where, under the guise of sanctuaries, you are going to have hunting grounds and fishing grounds, places of slaughter for fish and game.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS. Yes. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I want to point out to the gentleman from Georgia that the real purpose of the bill is to establish sanctuaries for wild game which his people in Georgia and our people in Nebraska like to shoot. In Minnesota that wild life will be preserved, so that we shall all get the benefit of it.

Mr. ADKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS. Yes.

Mr ADKINS. There is another bill pending, I think, coming up to-day, for another refuge and rest ground in Utah, and one in Kansas. The theory is that along the different lanes through which they pass from north to south or south to north they will have some place where they will not be shot at. It was proposed that the bills be amended so as to take from the Department of Agriculture the right of permitting hunting at any time.

Mr. EDWARDS. Does not the gentleman think we ought to have a general and well worked out program for these refuges instead of going into the subject piecemeal?

Mr. ADKINS. This refuge has already been started, and a good deal of money has been expended on it. This is to complete the program for that one at that place.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. This report from the Department of Agriculture states that this amendment will not cost a dollar more, that the money they now have is sufficient, but that there is some valuable land that they can not get at $5 an acre. This is not asking for more money, but simply to enable them to complete the project Congress authorized.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS. Yes.

Mr. McMILLAN. This is not a question as to the policy of establishing sanctuaries, but it is a bill, as I understand it, simply to authorize the payment of $10 an acre which four years ago was authorized for $5. This is not a question of policy as to whether we shall have a sanctuary here or elsewhere in the country. I think the gentleman from Georgia will agree that we ought to preserve wild life and game.

I am concerned about the fact that four years ago you could get this land for $5 an acre, and now they are coming in here and asking for $10. We have no assurance but that two or three years from now they will come in here again asking for $20.

Mr. EDWARDS. I will say to the gentleman from South Carolina that the reason given here a few minutes ago as to why this additional amount is required is the fact that part of this land is valuable timberland. Now, the Government has no use for that timber, and ought not to buy it.

Mr. ADKINS. In a community where somebody has gone in and bought a farm surrounded by this land, the owner will be troubled by the fact that he will be crowded, and the average price ought to be raised here so that this additional land can be acquired.

Mr. EDWARDS. If you buy this timberland, poachers will come in and steal the timber and the Government will have only the land.

Mr. SCHAFER. Does not the gentleman think an amendment should be incorporated in the resolution which will prevent the purchase of any additional land until the Government has had options for all of it? Because if we can not buy all of that land and private individuals own small or large tracts of land within the reservation, you will really have private shooting grounds on those lands.

Mr. EDWARDS. We have not very much information in the report. We have a letter from the Secretary, but it is not very clear. What I get out of it is that we need 80,000 more acres at $10 an acre.

The average price will be $10 per acre, which means it will cost $10, and it will cost the Government $850,000.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman has stated several times that this legislation should be put over until a comprehensive plan of game preservation could be worked out for the entire country. This plan originated with Senator HAWES, of Missouri, when he was a Member of the House.

Mr. EDWARDS. I think the original migratory plan originated with Mr. Weeks several years prior to that.

Mr. KNUTSON. I mean as far as acquiring land along the Mississippi is concerned. It is said to be the greatest spawning ground for small-mouth black bass there is known anywhere. It is a great place for them to stop in their migration north and south, so we must have all of this land or it will not serve the purpose as well as is necessary. The gentleman from Florida has referred to the fact that the North is getting everything. I want to say that in taking this land the Federal Government is taking the best bass-fishing grounds in the world away from us but we are perfectly willing that it shall be taken away if it be devoted to the purpose provided in the bill.

Mr. EDWARDS. I should think so at $10 an acre.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman must understand that adjacent to this land there is $150 and $200 land. The gentleman must not think that we are unloading a desert on the Government.

Mr. EDWARDS. No; because I understand it is mostly water instead of a desert.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman has not been up there so it would be impossible to describe this territory to him.

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS. Yes.

Mr. BOX. Has the gentleman any information as to whether lands in the Mississippi Valley or farm lands over the country generally have doubled in value during the last four or five years?

Mr. EDWARDS. My information is lands have not increased in value. To the contrary, my information is that lands have decreased in value in that time. The thing which has attracted the attention of the opposition here to-day is the fact that only four years ago we were told this land could be bought for $5 an acre, but now they want $10. I want to tell you, my friends, the country is tired of this so-called economy, which is but waste and Republican extravagance.

Mr. ROMJUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS. Yes.

Mr. ROMJUE. The gentleman referred to the land that has already been purchased. Can he tell us the average price that was paid for that land per acre?

Mr. EDWARDS. It ran around $5, as I understand it.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Five dollars is the average price.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. At the time the bill was under consideration the committee had no estimate as to the value of this particular land and the $5 per acre was largely a guess on the part of the committee. In order to safeguard the Treasury, it was provided that land should not be bought which exceeded an average of $5 an acre. It has been stated that these are valuable timberlands.

Practically all of this land is overflowed land and has no value for agricultural purposes. However, there is some soft timber on the tract, and I believe the estimated value is said to be somewhere around $15 an acre, and that it will be necessary to pay much more than $5 an acre for a part of the tract. Therefore it is suggested that the purchase price be limited to $10. Let me also state to the gentleman that in 1923 the Bureau of Fisheries at low water rescued one hundred and forty-eight million 3 to 6 inch fish and forty million 4 to 6 inch fish from this particular region. It is of value, especially when you consider the fact that these fish were shipped to stock the waters of 32 States of the Union.

Mr. EDWARDS. It is the inconsistency of the thing. I know there are some of us who want to expedite and speed up the program of highway construction in this country. We wanted to appropriate this year, many of us, $100,000,000 a year for the next two years to expedite and speed up the highway construction in this country, but we are told in that connection that the financial policy of the administration will not permit over $75,000,000 per year in that regard. We are told we must cut down here and cut down there on many important and constructive matters, and yet with this proposition you take out of the Treasury $850,000, and we are told it is not contrary to the President's financial program.

Mr. HUDSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS. Yes.

Mr. HUDSON. Does not the gentleman understand, and will not the gentleman agree with me, that this is one of the first steps necessary in furnishing flood control on the Mississippi?

Mr. EDWARDS. I do not know whether or not it has any connection with it at all.

Mr. HUDSON. If we had taken the waste land along the Mississippi Valley and kept it as a game refuge we would not have the flood-control proposition thrust upon us at this time. This is one of the great resources which we ought to conserve in this matter of flood control.

Mr. EDWARDS. Then we ought to put it on as an amendment to the flood control bill that will carry more than $400,000,000. I hope, my friends, we will consider this proposition carefully and thoroughly before we pass it. The price of that land has jumped since we first started the project from $5 to $10 per acre, and the reason given now is that a lot of this land is good timberland; but, as I stated a moment ago, the Government ought not to go into the timber business.

Mr. HAMMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWARDS. Yes.

Mr. HAMMER. In the Weeks Forestry Act it was provided that the Government could not purchase timberland because the price would be prohibitive. The rule was to pay $2.50, $3, $5, and $7.50 being the limit.

That is the reason they now have a lot of land in the southern Appalachians. For instance, they acquired the Vanderbilt land of 70,000 acres at $5 an acre, which was above the average price. The average was something like $2 an acre, and it was in this way they acquired the large acreage of land in the southern Appalachian Mountains.

Mr. EDWARDS. I thank the gentleman for his remarks and for this information.

I do not want to be misunderstood. I am for sane conservation. The Government now has over 40,000 acres for this refuge, and this is enough to proceed on until we can work out a general program. The people are groaning under the taxes they have to pay now, and it seems we are not going to get any tax reduction at this session at the hands of the Republicans, who are in power.

Oh, we are told the country is prosperous; but do bread lines mean prosperity? If I am any judge of the situation, the country is practically ruined by this Republican prosperity. We are not prosperous enough at this time, my friends, when the country is asking for tax reduction, to go into buying up additional lands for game and fish preserves and refuges.

We have carried this wild-life and migratory-bird idea to an extreme, violated the Constitution in many instances, as we are likely to do in the passage of this pending measure, and caused a lot of confusion as to the laws and regulations, to say nothing of having spent a lot of money out of the Treasury for no real good purpose. The taxes of the people ought not to be wasted. It is through taxes and taxes alone that money is gotten into the Treasury. The expenditure of that money ought to be made in a wise, economic, and judicious manner. Ours is a grave responsibility. Every dollar that does not go for a real good governmental purpose is misspent, and I am not willing that it be done. In this case we were told in 1924 that all the lands necessary in connection with this proposition could be had for $5 an acre, and a great lot of lands, amounting to forty-odd thousand acres, have actually been bought at $5 an acre. Too much land has been bought in on this proposition as it is, and, in my opinion, enough lands are now in hand to carry on the work contemplated in this measure. Now we are told 85,000 more acres must be bought at an average price of $10 per acre. This means, as I have said, an expenditure of an additional $850,000 for lands upon which to enlarge this game and fish refuge.

I received a communication to-day from a constituent of mine, and, with the permission of the House, I am going to insert it in the RECORD as part of my remarks about other bills along this wild-life and migratory-bird idea, which is as follows:

SPECIAL ATTENTION—MEMBERS OF CONGRESS—SUBJECT: SENATE BILL 1271 AND HOUSE BILL 5467—DO YOU WANT MORE TAXATION ON THE FARMERS OF THE UNITED STATES?—DO YOU WANT MORE BUREAU GOVERNMENT IN WASHINGTON, D. C., WITH ITS LAWMAKING POWERS?—DO YOU WANT TO THROTTLE YOUR STATE GAME DEPARTMENTS AND COMMISSIONS?—BLIND-POOL JOKER IN MIGRATORY BIRD LAW

The blind pool refuge bill is again before Congress. It has a good chance of being passed. The bureau officials in Washington, allied with the professional protectionists of New York City, have succeeded in tacking it onto the migratory bird law. The latter is a meritorious piece of legislation. The joker they have attached to it strikes at the heart of self-government. It throttles the splendid State game commissions that have been built up in many States and are being developed in others.

The bureau chiefs in Washington and their adroit associates in New York are intent upon getting into their own hands the game funds of the country. They have enlisted the support of Senator NORBECK, from South Dakota, chairman of the Agricultural Committee. The bill, through his influence, has been sent to the Senate.

If this bill is passed it will confer lawmaking powers upon the clerks of the Biological Survey. It clearly provides that the rules and regulations which they may make should have the force of law. It confers police powers upon the Secretary of Agriculture and his employees—something that was not even remotely contemplated when his department was organized.

If this bill is passed it will deny the citizen the right of trial in his own community. It authorizes a petty Federal official to drag a reputable citizen hundreds of miles for trial before a Federal official located in another State. The bill authorizes Federal officials to arrange settlements without trial. This provision is an incentive to dishonesty. It encourages petty officials to practice petty annoyances upon sportsmen whom they may find afield.

If this bill is passed it will enable a group of men in Washington to remove hundreds of thousands of dollars from the State in which it was collected and disburse it when and where they will.

This bill, in practically the same form, was defeated in the Sixty-seventh, Sixty-eighth, and Sixty-ninth Congresses.

Mr. Mondell, the Republican floor leader, in denouncing the game refuge bill, said: "I believe the measure is so far-reaching in its consequences it would be so tremendously harmful in the long run to my country and to its people that I can not support it or any part of it."

Mr. GARRETT, the Democratic floor leader, said he was opposed to the legislation and asked, "How long do you think we can continue to yield to the blandishments, the propaganda, and the temptations of expediency in measures such as this?"

Judge Ward, the Congressman from North Carolina, scored the bill as the crowning infamy of them all.

Ex-Senator Wadsworth, of New York, in a recent address, said: "There has been built up at Washington a bureaucracy so vast and complicated that no one can understand the operations of the Government of the United States as it exists to-day. It is a bureaucracy which is not responsive to public sentiment. We are whittling at the structure established by the forefathers, and if we whittle long enough we shall destroy it."

Mr. Keith McCanse, State game commissioner of Missouri, says: "It is all wrong for the double license to be inflicted upon the hunters of the United States in order to create a tremendous fund for use of bureaucracy. Do we want to create in Washington another powerful Federal bureau with its agents nosing into every nook of the land?

If this bill becomes a law it will be because the sportsmen of this country and their representatives in Congress do not understand its far-reaching influence.—[Editorial from the Forest and Stream Magazine of March, 1928, issue. Founders of the Audubon Society and the migratory bird law.]

NOW READ THE FEW LINES BELOW

A vote for Senate bill 1271 or H. R. 5467 is a vote for more taxes on the farmers and poor hunters of the United States; more bureaucracy in Washington, D. C.; throttling of State game departments and commissions; and more destruction to migratory birds and wild life, not less.

A vote against the pending bills (S. 1271; H. R. 5467) is a vote for less taxes on the farmers and poor hunters of the United States; less bureaucracy in Washington, D. C.; more local State government; and less destruction to migratory birds and wild life in the United States.

Members of Congress, which do you prefer?

The question is up to you.

What will be your decision?

R. M. VARNEDOE,
Hinesville, Ga., Liberty County.

I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ABERNETHY].

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have a great deal of respect for my friend the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS], but I think the position he has taken is not sound, with all due respect to him.

I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this bill we are now seeking to perfect is the creature of a very distinguished Democrat who is now a Senator from the State of Missouri, Mr. HAWES. [Applause.] I think it is one of the most constructive pieces of legislation we have embarked upon in many a day.

I come from a section of country that abounds in game, wild game of all sorts. I have practically 2,000 square miles of water in my district, and I had the pleasure of having the Secretary of Agriculture year before last come down to my district, and while there we showed him some real game shooting. I think Mr. Jardine is a man of integrity and I think he has a very broad view of this entire question.

This bill comes into the House with a unanimous report from the great Committee on Agriculture. I find myself in this situation: I think the bill is right because the game in the summer time is not in the South. The game is in our waters in the wintertime and in the summer time in the northern waters, and this very refuge, as I understand, is to be a place where no man can shoot them or disturb them while they are resting there, and that fish may spawn and breed there, with no fishing allowed; is not that correct?

Mr. CLAGUE. That is correct.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I think that is one of the greatest things in favor of the bill. I think we need more of these refuges, and I have enough faith in the membership of the House to believe that if we aid them in putting this over and we have a meritorious proposition in our own section of the country they will come to our aid and relief. [Applause.] This is shown here every time we pass a rivers and harbors bill. At the last Congress they aided my section of the country and helped me vote $6,000,000 for an inland waterway. Suppose you had taken the same position over there that my friend from Georgia has taken this afternoon. We would never have that aid and assistance in developing our section of the country. This is a great, big country and we have to work together.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS. The gentleman from Georgia has not taken the position he is against the bill because the game refuge is located where it is.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I do not understand that to be the position of the gentleman, but I do say if you defeat this measure on account of the price, you defeat the project. That is all there is to it. [Applause.] It is only a question of $5 an acre, and this will not break the Government. I am willing to vote $1,000,000 and put it into a beneficial proposition that is going to help the whole country.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. If they are fearful they have not enough money, why not amend the Volstead Act and get a lot of additional revenue in that way?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Well, we are talking about water, not liquor. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SCHAFER. We are talking about "bottle bass."

Mr. ABERNETHY. I really think, gentleman, this is a very constructive piece of legislation, and I hope to see this movement spread over the entire country. We have to protect our game and fish. It will be so after a while that the wild game will be like the buffalo. There are none in this country at all now except a few herds in our parks. I remember, for instance, when I was a boy, there used to be clouds and clouds of wild pigeons going north and south. There is not a one in the country to-day. Where are they?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Gentlemen, I am in favor of economy, but this is constructive economy. This is a great conservation measure, and, as I say, it was the dream of our distinguished colleague, Senator HAWES, when he was a Member of the House, to put this through, and whether he put it through or whoever put it through, I think we ought to pass this bill. It has the unanimous report of the great Committee on Agriculture. There is no politics in it, but it is to protect and conserve our wild life and fish. With regard to the timber, we need the wooded land as well as the streams to protect the game, and we have the assurance of the Secretary of Agriculture that he can put this over if we will allow him this privilege, and surely he is not going ahead and waste the money. I think we ought to pass the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. There is nothing to the point raised by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box] that this land has doubled in value in the last three or four years. The chairman of the Committee on Agriculture has explained to the House fully that when the original bill was reported out the committee did not know what this land was going to cost, and they fixed the maximum at $5 an acre. We have found that is not sufficient, and that it is now necessary to raise the maximum to $10, but the land has not doubled in value.

Mr. ABERNETHY. It is not going to break the Government, anyway, and I am for the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL].

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, the original act creating this game refuge was enacted by the Congress, both Houses, by practically a unanimous vote. The Government did not know in advance the price of all the land and it was impossible or impracticable to secure an option on all the land in advance. So as a restrictive measure the price was fixed at an average of $5 an acre.

The Department of Agriculture now reports that it has investigated and has proceeded as far and as rapidly as possible and has secured all the lands available at $5 an acre and has now returned to the Congress for authority to raise the average.

It is a very practicable and sensible proposition. It is the only thing that can be done. The Committee on Agriculture held hearings. There were a large number of witnesses and there were explanations in detail, and it was the unanimous vote of the committee that this is the only intelligent procedure unless we are now to abandon the whole project.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASWELL. Yes.

Mr. ALLGOOD. If we vote this $10 an acre now, what assurance have we that these people will not come back here next session of Congress and ask for $20 an acre?

Mr. ASWELL. It is not within the province of any gentleman on the floor of this House to give any other gentleman any assurance on any such proposition as that. In my own opinion, I am so convinced of the value of this, that for myself rather than to have the project defeated, I would vote for $20 an acre. [Applause.]

Mr. KETCHAM. And the gentleman will recall the interesting hearings we had on the subject. Is it not a fact that the point of view which has been developed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS] was developed in the committee itself, and that we were satisfied, unanimously, that while we did not exactly approve of this increase, it is the only way in which this great project could go through.

Mr. ASWELL. All of the points brought out by the gentleman from Georgia were presented to the committee, and finally the committee agreed on the proposition.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASWELL. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman comes from the great Mississippi Valley.

Mr. ASWELL. And the lower part of it—the flooded area.

Mr. KNUTSON. From a very important part of it.

Mr. ASWELL. The richest part of it.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman state to the House his observations as to the increase in wild life since these sanctuaries were established?

Mr. ASWELL. Many hundred per cent in my part of the country.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And the gentleman's understanding of a sanctuary is the same as mine, that no hunting should be permitted in the sanctuary?

Mr. ASWELL. Absolutely.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We agree on that.

Mr. ASWELL. Absolutely.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, there are several elements to which I object in this situation. It is true that the Agricultural Committee in their wisdom have unanimously recommended this resolution, but sometimes we have differed with their wisdom, and I do now for several reasons. In the first place, here are a lot of people who owned land that under the statute which was formerly enacted have parted with it at $5 an acre. The fellows who did not want to part with it at that figure have stood out. We are not dealing justly with those people who have already sold when we come up now and say that we will give these other fellows $10 an acre.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. That question was brought up in the committee, and it was clearly developed that the land that had been purchased at $5 an acre was not to be compared at all with the other land it is now proposed to purchase, so far as value is concerned.

Mr. STEVENSON. That being true, if there is no comparison at all, how do you compare them by making one worth $5 an acre and the other $10 an acre. In other words, you paid a lot for something that was worthless, according to that position.

Mr. ASWELL. I did not say that it was worthless.

Mr. STEVENSON. It does not compare.

Mr. ASWELL. The gentleman did not quote my statement.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman's statement is in the RECORD. I do not yield any further.

Mr. ASWELL. I did not make any such statement as the gentleman quoted.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman's statement is in the RECORD, and I stand by it. The fact confronts us that we are now asked to pay twice as much for land, adjoining land, as we have bought at $5 an acre. Whether there is any comparison between the two or not, I do not know. I see this calls for buying land and water. I want to know how much an acre they are paying for water up there. This report says that they already have 70,000 acres of sanctuary there now. Is that not enough to put into one city of refuge away up at the headwaters of the Mississippi, where the birds have to fly a thousand miles in order to get there? Nobody will be able to shoot them without traveling a thousand miles, except those who are locally around there. I think you have already purchased enough land when you have 70,000 acres in one preserve. This matter of acquiring land by the Government seems to have become a matter of very frequent occurrence. We are asked to buy land here and buy land there for this purpose and that purpose, and what is the result of it? The first thing we know, here we have already 70,000 acres withdrawn from taxation in the States where this land is located. You now propose to withdraw 85,000 acres more from taxation and from all local levies, and then Uncle Sam is expected to do something for that country, and they will always be claiming that they ought to have this and that because they have a great game preserve up there. The acquisition of land by the United States Government has gone on to such an extent that I have stopped voting to buy any more land anywhere. There is a lot of talk about putting one of these preserves down in the coast country of South Carolina. I have not seen any considerable movement in that direction as yet, but I would not be in favor of it if there was, because I want the lands in South Carolina, except those absolutely necessary for strictly Government purposes to be subject to the jurisdiction of the courts and the taxing officers of the State, and that is where all the lands ought to be. Having bought 70,000 acres at $5 an acre, I am in favor of standing pat. You have practically 110 square miles of land. Is that not enough for the sparrows and the birds that roost up and down Pennsylvania Avenue here to the annoyance of the people with new hats? Have you not enought of a sanctuary for all that kind of thing, anyway?

Mr. ALLGOOD. I have heard considerable complaint from some of the Members from the northwestern part of the country about the Government owning so much public land up there.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; it has been a great cry, and they have been asking for unusual concessions as to public improvements because the Government has so much land that is not taxable.

I am opposed to taking any more away from these gentlemen in so far as taxation is concerned. That is the principle upon which I stand in regard to all these things. The Government has no business to take land except in case of national safety and national conservation—it has no business tying up land and taking it out from the jurisdiction of the taxing officer.

Mr. McMILLAN. What guaranty have we that they will not come here in the future and ask for authority to buy land at $20 an acre?

Mr. STEVENSON. How many people have obligated themselves to sell land at $10 an acre? If there was anything in evidence before the committee it is not stated in the report.

Mr. KETCHAM. I think the gentleman will find a statement of the Department of Agriculture in reference to that.

Mr. STEVENSON. That it has an option on land that it can buy at $10 an acre?

Mr. KETCHAM. It is the judgment of the department based upon surveys actually made that no further authorization will be requested, that this authorization is made to cover all the land that they propose to take.

Mr. STEVENSON. How much land have they under option that they can buy at $10 an acre?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Can the gentleman inform the committee what the assessed valuation of this land is?

Mr. STEVENSON. No; I was not on the committee, and I doubt if anyone on the committee knows.

Mr. ANDRESEN. That is all in the record.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The assessed valuation?

Mr. ANDRESEN. No; not the assessed valuation.

Mr. STEVENSON. I venture to say to the gentleman from Kentucky that if he will look into it he will find that the value of these lands are not over 50 cents an acre for taxation. [Applause.]

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE].

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, sometimes it is amusing how you get down to dollars and cents whenever agriculture is at stake or any great conservation for the benefit of the people. This project in the upper Mississippi is a part of the conservation scheme for wild fowl and the breeding of fish that is trying to be worked out by the Agricultural Committee.

I do not care how many wild fowl you have that fly from the North to the South in the winter; you may have millions of them, but unless you have a rest and feeding grounds for these birds in transit it is only a question of time when you will have none.

Now, what is the program of the Agricultural Committee? The gentleman from Utah [Mr. COLTON] has a bill establishing a game preserve in Utah. The evidence before the committee shows that these birds go there by hundreds, and they are being killed by pot hunters all around with no protection over it. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] has another bill. The evidence shows that that is a great concentration place for ducks, where they go by the thousands.

In Tennessee is another concentration place, and there are other places in the Carolinas and down the Potomac River.

I believe the Federal Government ought to appropriate Federal money out of the Treasury and own these great concentration points, if you are going to protect the wild life of this country.

The gentleman from New York asked whether they were game refuges and to be sanctuaries. I will say that at my instance we put an amendment on the bill of the gentleman from Utah providing that 60 per cent of the area should always be a sanctuary and no gun ever fired in it. [Applause.] I would not vote for a bill that would leave it even to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture to establish these sanctuaries. I do not want to build up and maintain a place for the big hunters.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman will recollect that the bill we had up at the last session was backed and financed by the gun and cartridge makers?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes; I voted against that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What did I understand the gentleman to say about the 60 per cent sanctuary and 40 per cent hunting—that is not in this bill.

Mr. KINCHELOE. No; I was talking about the Utah bill.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does the gentleman think that would conserve it? How would you make the separation?

Mr. KINCHELOE. The Biological Survey under the Department of Agriculture will have supervision over all that matter, and 40 per cent hunting would be only when so ordered by the Secretary of Agriculture and only at such times as he sees fit.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him another question? I was a little troubled about this bill, as I have been such a stickler for sanctuaries, but not sanctuaries for hunters.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The gentleman from Virginia is no more of a stickler for fish and game sanctuaries than I am.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But now we come to the question of cost, and we read in the report from the Secretary that—

> If the proposed amendment is adopted the department is of the opinion that it will not be necessary to ask for funds in addition to those already authorized for the acquisition of the desired areas to be included in the refuge.

Am I correct in my inference therefore that this requires no further sum of money than that heretofore authorized?

Mr. KINCHELOE. That is true.

Mr. STEVENSON. But it means that they can pay $10 per acre for the land now, whereas under the law that we passed we were to pay $5.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It means they shall not exceed $10 an acre?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes. But suppose we had to pay $10 an acre for all of it. The evidence before the Committee on Agriculture is that the area in the upper Mississippi is the greatest bass spawning ground in the world, where they get the bass with which to stock the streams of your State and my State and the State of South Carolina. The State of Minnesota has turned over 8,000 acres for this purpose, and someone in the State of Iowa, an individual, has turned over $40,000 worth of land which he gave the Government. We passed an enabling act the other day to take it in. If it is necessary, I would be in favor of paying even $100 an acre for the balance of this land in order to preserve the wild fowl and have spawning grounds for the black bass. I am not concerned about the cost so long as it is reasonable.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman put into his remarks a statement as to the various areas donated for this purpose by various people?

Mr. KINCHELOE. The State of Minnesota donated 8,000 acres, and some one in the State of Iowa has donated $40,000 worth of land. I do not think the Agricultural Department is going to run wild and crazy and go around and buy a lot of land for more than it is worth. The purpose is to acquire this great spawning and feeding and breeding ground in the upper Mississippi, and the purpose is to go out to Utah and to Kansas and into Reelfoot Lake, if desired, and into the gentleman's State of North Carolina and other States, and establish these game reserves.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I think the gentleman is right on that.

Mr. KINCHELOE. There is nothing provincial or sectional about it. The purpose is to preserve the wild life of this country. You must have a place for them to feed and to rest, and if you have to take the money out of the Federal Treasury I am in favor of doing that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will say to the gentleman from North Carolina that the hunters are not going to North Carolina for a refuge, but they are going there in order to destroy and hunt.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I hope this bill will be passed so that this program can be started.

Mr. ABERNETHY. We want to conserve the wild life in North Carolina and in Virginia, and I presume this bill, as I understand it, is intended to conserve and not to destroy.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes. I think the gentleman from North Carolina will concede that he is the best Member of Congress from his district in North Carolina, and I am glad that he is in sympathy with this measure. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I shall not be able to say anything worth while on this bill in two minutes.

Mr. EDWARDS. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized for seven minutes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it was my pleasure some years ago—in fact, soon after I came to Congress—to vote for the first bill for the purpose of protecting migratory birds. After that bill was passed by the House we entered into a treaty with Great Britain, and it was my pleasure to vote for the bill which carried out the provisions of the treaty for the protection of the wild fowl of this country. Since that time Maryland has become noted for its thousands of wild ducks, which had narrowly escaped being exterminated before the passage of that act. Birds of all kinds are replenishing our fields and forests. I do not think we can spend too much money for the protection of wild fowl and fish.

I once introduced a bill myself for the protection of migratory fish, and if that bill had passed I am sure we would have an abundance of fish in all parts of our country. I think we should establish game refuges wherever they are necessary. The Department of Agriculture knows where they should best be located. In your boyhood days and in mine we knew where the birds went, and where they stopped overnight, and such things as that. The Department of Agriculture knows where the game birds go.

It is not a question of what we ought to pay. We should procure these lands to protect the birds and the fish and other wild life. This would be a pretty lonely country for those of us who were born in the rural districts if we did not have any bird life. I heard one gentleman speak of the wild pigeons that were once so plentiful. I remember the time when we had thousands of those birds. I believe the last one died somewhere out in the West a few years ago in an aviary out in Cincinnati. Had those pigeons have had the protection we are giving wild life to-day they would still be plentiful. The dearth of wild life destroys the equilibrium of nature's laws, and permits those destroying insects and pests to prey upon the crops and cause heavy loss of production to the farmers.

The birds are the farmer's great friend in the destruction of his enemies. They are man's great friend in their feathery beauty and sweet songs. Like the flowers and trees which adorn the landscape and beautify nature, so do the birds in their happiness and beauty glorify the country and add to the pleasures of life.

I want to see this bill passed. I trust that the gentlemen who are carrying out this proposition will endeavor to procure options on all the land contained within these boundaries, because if certain land is left within the boundaries of the land purchased it will be impossible to carry out the idea which we have in mind. I am sure the Agricultural Department will have this in mind.

I want to see the bill pass. Unless I can be convinced, however, that there is some protection against gunning it is my purpose to introduce an amendment at the end of the bill providing that no gunning or fishing shall take place on this game preserve.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. ANDRESEN. The original act provides that this is to be a permanent sanctuary for migratory birds and wild life.

Mr. LINTHICUM. And that there shall be no gunning or fishing within its boundaries.

Mr. ANDRESEN. That is so. It is to be a permanent sanctuary.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Then I shall support the bill and wish it well. Allow me to state, that, in my opinion, the committee should also establish such sanctuaries in the great military reservations of the country such as Fort Leonard Wood, the Aberdeen proving grounds, and such like places throughout the land. [Applause.]

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALLGOOD].

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I like to hunt, and especially do I like to fish. When I can get out on a creek bank or a river bank and the fish begin biting, it makes a good feeling come over me, and I enjoy it. It is worth while to recreate, and I am sure all my colleagues in this House believe in recreation; but we have a measure that has already been before this House. It has been thrashed out once, and you are to-day taking the time of this body again. You are putting the grain through the mill a second time and are using the water that has already gone over the dam. In this measure you are asking for increased appropriations. Almost an additional million dollars is asked for in this bill. The former act provided funds sufficient to buy 70,000 acres of land at $5 an acre. We were assured that the lands were swamp and overflowed lands and only worth $5 an acre; now you want $10 an acre, because the Government is paying the bill.

Congress has appropriated funds to safeguard wild life, but what has been done for the conservation of other forms of life—human life? We have seen millions of dollars worth of property and hundreds of lives destroyed in the Mississippi Valley, and this session of Congress is almost at a close. I saw it predicted this week that we will adjourn the 19th day of May. What have we done for the protection of lives and of property in the Mississippi Valley? You are bringing measures of this character on the floor of the House, yet all farm legislation and other important legislation of this country is at a standstill. You can not get these bills up here. We have idle property at Muscle Shoals, with $150,000,000 worth of the people's money tied up in those nitrate plants, absolutely idle. We can not get legislation here to place them to producing fertilizers for the relief of agriculture. We can not get any farm relief.

I understand the report on this measure states that it is not in conflict with the President's policy of economy, and yet any legislation that seeks to take care of agriculture in this country seems to be against the President's policy of economy. It seems to me Congress is frittering away its time with such measures as this, when outstanding legislation, that demands the attention of people throughout this Nation, should be given our attention. Personally, I do not approve of it, and while I am in favor of conservation of wild life, I believe that the proponents of this measure should be satisfied and should not be bringing such a measure as this before Congress when outstanding legislation should be given attention. [Applause.]

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WELSH].

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have an opportunity to speak on this bill, not because I fear the bill is in danger of defeat but in order that the authorities or the influences which are shaping our national policy with respect to conservation may have an idea as to how the various Members of Congress from the various localities feel on the subject as a matter of principle. Coming as I do from one of the big cities of the Nation, I am heartily in favor of the bill, not because I am a hunter nor because I am a fisherman, for I am neither. But I am interested in this bill from the economic and sentimental viewpoint and for economic reasons. From an economic point of view the birds and forests are absolutely necessary for the maintenance of our national life. From a sentimental viewpoint I feel, if we take away from this great country of ours the wild flowers and wild life that the Lord placed here, so that the future generations will not know from observation and contact the flora or fauna of America, we will lose one of the greatest influences that go to make up our national character. I do not think that is an exaggerated statement. I for one feel the time has come when we must go even further along the line of national conservation than we have hitherto gone because of the great increase in our population and because of the increased means of locomotion and transportation. The automobile and the airplane are rapidly reducing this country to a state where no place is sacred and the life of neither flower or beast is sacred at the hands of those who would destroy without any judgment or wisdom whatever.

The gunning feature is absolutely prohibited in this bill. I want to place myself on record as being unalterably opposed to allowing gunning on any future reservations that may be created, because such a permission is simply providing private hunting grounds at public expense. There are only two ways of getting the results desired by this bill. One is the method advocated in the bill and the other is by having great private ownerships, such as have existed in England for the past 1,000 years—yes; from the days of the feudal system—and I prefer this system rather than the English system because the people themselves will have control of these reservations for all time. [Applause.]

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McMILLAN].

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have followed the debate to-day, and to some extent have already expressed my views on this subject. This is not a question, gentlemen, of whether or not any individual Member of the Congress shall express himself with respect to his views about the conservation of game and wild life in this country. I think, Mr. Chairman, every man here to some extent at least is in favor of the conservation of our wild life in some way, but this proposed amendment is not a question of conservation of wild life but solely a question of whether or not we are going to authorize $10 to be paid for land which just four years ago was to be bought for $5 an acre, as provided for by the law.

My understanding is that in 1924 the original bill came up, and it was said in the course of that debate that if $5 was authorized for this purpose that was all that would be necessary for the purchase of this area. Down in my country we have land, as I stated a moment ago, thousands and thousands of acres, 30,000 acres in one tract, that we can buy for $3.50 per acre for such purposes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question and a brief observation?

Mr. McMILLAN. I will be pleased to yield.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. When this bill was before the House at some time on its original passage I made the objection that in all probability the committee would be back asking for more money, and I particularly inquired whether or not this limit of $5 per acre would be exceeded, and I was assured by the committee that this was swamp and overflowed land and that it could be purchased without any difficulty whatever within the $5 limitation. What has happened is this: When the Government went to purchasing the land some of the owners raised their price, and hence we are now asked to increase the limit of cost. I am opposed to it.

Mr. McMILLAN. There, my friends, the gentleman from Texas is calling attention to exactly what happened on that occasion, and that is why I am now criticizing them for coming back here and asking for $10 an acre when $5 an acre was definitely agreed upon at that time.

My friend from North Carolina [Mr. ABERNETHY], as well as my friend from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS], and all of us along the South Atlantic coast, know we have great areas down there teeming with wild life, and all of us are in favor of its conservation, but to come here and within four years raise the price to $10 an acre when it was agreed that $5 was all that was necessary, and then, perchance, in four years from now come back and ask for $20 or $30 an acre, is not fair to the committee.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Does the gentleman think we would ever get any conservation areas down in our country if we destroyed this bill?

Mr. McMILLAN. My friend, we have 40,000 or 50,000 acres already in operation under the original law.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Does the gentleman think that is enough? Does not the gentleman think 100,000 acres would be better? We need these great areas.

Mr. McMILLAN. Then go ahead and buy the 100,000 acres or 80,000 acres under the terms of the original bill; and as my colleague from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] has already stated, it is not fair to these men who have already sold their lands for $5 an acre to come back now and raise the price to $10 an acre.

I repeat, this is not a question of the conservation of game, but is a question of raising the price from $5 to $10 an acre when they solemnly agreed four years ago that $5 an acre would be all that would be necessary. [Applause.]

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. FULBRIGHT].

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I have always been in favor of conservation, I have always been in favor of protection, when it comes to conserving the wild life of the country or protecting human life or property in any section of the Nation. In this bill, however, I am afraid that you are trespassing upon the policy of economy that has been urged upon this Congress since its inception, especially the policy of economy that the administration is disposed to apply to flood control. While we are attempting to legislate for the conservation and protection of the wild life of the Nation, I think it very appropriate that I read a telegram received last night from the Kiwanis Club at Dexter in Stoddard County, Mo.:

Hon. J. F. FULBRIGHT,
United States Congress:

St. Francis River right now out of banks in Butler and Stoddard Counties flooding highways and farm lands. Families moving out and livestock drowned.

Here is an opportunity for the protection of human life and property in this country if this Congress will avail itself of the opportunity. So far as I am concerned, I am more interested in protecting human life than I am in protecting the wild life of the country. It occurs to me that the Congress should quit frittering away its time on matters of minor importance and devote its time to the solution of the flood-control problem. After reading the telegram to which I have just referred, I picked up a paper—Labor—published here in Washington, and my attention was at once attracted to this editorial:

PROBLEM OF FLOOD CONTROL—NOT A TIME FOR PICAYUNE ECONOMY; BLOCK THE GRAFTERS BY ALL MEANS, BUT MAKE THE MISSISSIPPI SAFE

The flood control bill as it passed the Senate authorized the appropriation of $325,000,000 to muzzle the Mississippi. Word comes that President Coolidge thinks this too high, especially since there are likely to be further expenses, and a veto is rumored unless the total cost is ascertained beforehand.

It is impossible to know beforehand the total cost of any big work—from damming a river to raising a baby. The question is whether the work is worth the cost.

The last flood devastated 18,000 square miles, all of which would be valuable land if protected. Figure it as good farm land alone, worth $100 per acre, and it comes out at $1,152,000,000.

This is more than three times the Senate figure, with nothing reckoned for city property, nothing for navigation, nothing for power. Probably these items taken together are worth four or five times as much as the land.

Complete control of the Mississippi would be a good investment at $2,000,000,000, or even at three.

The surest way to waste money on this work is to tackle it in piecemeal, picayune fashion. It is a big job to be handled in a big way.

Senator NORRIS is right, as usual, when he says that flood control, navigation, and power development on the main stream and on its tributaries must all be taken together. The time element must be considered, too. A year has been wasted already, and a superflood like that of 1927 is just as likely now as it was two years ago.

Of course, grafters are on the job, getting options on land back of the broken levees, preparing to hold up the Government on the price of a right of way.

Perhaps this is why the additional $5 per acre is asked in the pending bill to secure additional lands as a refuge for the wild life of this country.

Such buzzards always gather to such a feast; but they need not be allowed to interfere with the work. Congress should give the Executive authority to deal with them—and the Executive should deal in hard-boiled but intelligent fashion.

The total cost of a good job on the Mississippi and its tributaries will be returned many times over. As for financing, we are appropriating $700,000,000 per year for the Army and Navy, with no chance of getting anything back.

Statesmanship which would enable us, with safety, to reduce that expenditure 25 per cent would provide a billion dollars for flood work in six years without adding a penny to the total national outlay.

I say to you, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, that if this Congress is going on record in constructive legislation for the protection of human life and property in the way of flood-control legislation it ought to act at once. A broad-minded, statesmanlike view of the matter should be pursued. Quibbling over local contributions should be abandoned. To quibble over local contributions is to place dollars and cents above the question of protecting life and property in the Mississippi Valley. The whole country has been convinced that the problem of protecting life and property and the rehabilitation of this devastated section is national in its scope and that the National Government should assume full and complete financial responsibility. If we are to economize, let us economize in matters that are not of such commanding importance. If we are to economize, let us economize in matters where human life and the earnings of a lifetime are not at stake. If we are to economize, let us economize where economy is justifiable. The editorial which I have just read is saturated to the core with truth and presents an argument that is irrefutable. If we adjourn this Congress after merely passing legislation for the protection of the wild life of the country and without adequate flood-control legislation, we shall invite the condemnation of the people throughout this country. Such a failure would be an outrage if not a crime. Let us not subject ourselves to such an indictment. Let us stand up like men and courageously meet the issue. Let us at once get busy and adopt a flood-control program broad enough to afford protection to the Mississippi River and its tributaries. The Mississippi Valley is entitled to it and the whole country will approve our action. Let us not further delay. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read the bill, with the following committee amendment:

Provided further, That this provision shall not apply to any land or lands and water heretofore acquired or contracted for under the provisions of this act.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 1, after the word "which," strike out the remainder of the line and all of line 2 up to and including the word "purchase."

Mr. KNUTSON. What does that mean?

Mr. MAPES. This is the amendment suggested by my colleague the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], now in the chair. It is agreed to by the author of the bill, Mr. ANDRESEN, the gentleman from Minnesota, and, I understand, by the Committee on Agriculture.

It has been explained in the general debate. The purpose of the amendment is to limit the amount that can be paid for additional land to an average of $10 per acre. Some of the land that has been purchased already has been purchased at a sum considerably less than $10 per acre. The purpose of the amendment is to make it clear that the bill has in mind future purchases and to eliminate in figuring the average price the price that has been paid for the land heretofore purchased at a considerably less sum than $10 per acre. I think the amendment is in accord with the purpose of the committee and clarifies the meaning of the bill.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does not the proviso on page 2 cover that?

Mr. MAPES. It is thought that the language which I propose to strike out is contradictory to the second proviso.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will it be agreeable to have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. As I understand it, as the bill is now drawn it is intended to provide that all of the land purchased under this act shall not average more than $10 an acre?

Mr. MAPES. All lands purchased in the future.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. As I understand at present it is not only intended to make the average apply to land purchased in the future, but to all lands that have been purchased at a considerably less price than $10 an acre. What will be the effect of the gentleman's amendment; will it be to raise the average cost or will it lower it?

Mr. MAPES. The effect of my amendment will be to lower the average cost—to make sure that the price of the lands purchased in the future shall not average more than $10 an acre.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. The purpose of the gentleman's amendment is to lower the price rather than to raise it?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. To that I have no objection. I am in favor of that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 6, after the word "Act," insert: "Provided further, That the price of said lands shall not exceed the assessed valuation thereof for taxes in 1927.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRAMTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House Joint Resolution 200 and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MCMILLAN) there were—90 yeas and 21 nays.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The doors will be closed, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll. All those in favor of the passage of the bill, when their names are called, will answer "aye," and those opposed will answer "no."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 249, nays 69, answered "present" 1, not voting 113, as follows:

DEBATE UPON THE SUBJECT OF PROSPERITY AND PREPAREDNESS

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein an article of which I am the author which appeared in the Wall Street Magazine of April 7 on the subject of naval expenditures and policy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to me by the House of Representatives I am printing the negative argument of a written debate which was published in the Magazine of Wall Street under date of April 7, 1928, the subject being "Does our prosperity depend upon preparedness?"

The article is as follows:

DOES OUR PROSPERITY DEPEND UPON "PREPAREDNESS"?

(For the negative, Representative JAMES V. MCCLINTIC, Oklahoma, member of United States House of Representatives Committee on Naval Affairs)

I have the distinction of having opposed not only the administration's $4,200,000,000 nine-year naval program but of being the only member of the Naval Committee who opposed the modified building program decided upon by the latter.

My opposition to both programs is not based upon pacificism or blindness to the possibilities of war. There is a tremendous propaganda abroad to make the people believe that I and everybody who differ from the Navy's theory of naval extension are willing to place the prosperity and international preeminence of the United States in jeopardy for the sake of saving a few hundred millions of dollars. We are accused of being ready to sell the United States out to England and Japan and let them maintain the naval superiority we waived when we scrapped potential command of the seas after the naval limitation conference. So far as I am concerned, the accusation is most unjust. I believe in reasonable preparedness against the remote chance of war. My opposition both to the administration's grandiose program and to that of the majority of the committee is based on the following propositions:

1. They are wastefully extravagant.
2. They are militaristic.
3. They are tactically obsolete and do not insure national defense.

WHAT THE PROGRAM WOULD INVOLVE

The naval program favored by the administration would involve a total naval expenditure of more than $4,000,000,000 in the next nine years, including upkeep. Another naval armament limitation conference is to be held in 1931. If it decides upon further limitation, we shall then be in the same position as in 1922. We had a supreme Navy program under way then, and actually had to scrap approximately $300,000,000 worth of building vessels. It is the height of folly now to get ready for another scrapping orgy. Admiral Jones told us that not a single new ship can be completed inside of three years; hence in 1931 our shipyards would be full of building craft ready for the wreckers. Knowing these facts, it is certain that the other naval powers will hold back their construction and thus be in a position to vote with equanimity for more scrapping, with the United States as the only scrapper.

I am in favor of saving approximately $175,000,000 of the amount the majority would spend in the next three years, thereby making available $100,000,000 to be used in the construction of submarines and the strengthening of our aircraft. Such a program would prevent the laying down of the type of ship which will be the subject of discussion and might be caused to be scrapped by the naval limitation conference in 1931.

Already 82 per cent of Federal expenditures is in support of military policies, and it is proposed to make it 92 per cent.

It is undeniable that we have a large body of propaganda, if not of opinion, in this country that wants to have the United States the supreme military power of the world, through enlarging the Navy. No doubt many good people earnestly believe that the way to maintain perpetual world peace and guard our prosperity in the coming period of foreign-trade growth and rivalry is for us to be so strong as to enforce peace. Others see ominous war clouds day and night and fear that if we do not build up and maintain a tremendous Navy of the kind they want our envious rivals are going to come over here and smash our primacy in the world. This sort of people really believe in the peace of the big stick, and they are at heart admirers of military glory. Here I would say that there is little or no difference between the administration program and that voted by the committee. About the only important difference is that the former would now commit us to a nine-year building program, whereas the latter contents itself with a three-year program that represents about all that could be done within three years under the nine-year program. The big and wasteful navy advocates have won, despite the camouflage that they have been tamed by public opinion.

INTERNATIONAL GOOD WILL

In my opinion, this is no time for the United States to flaunt its overshadowing power by engaging in a navy-building enterprise that will fill the world with ill will and crush reviving economic strength under a burden of taxation. Our influence should be all in favor of international good will and the elimination of war. No nation or group of nations in the world would dream of attacking us or risking our wrath in the present condition of things. They can't afford war. The approximate indebtedness of England is $37,200,000,000; the United States, $18,284,000,000; France and her colonies, $12,872,000,000; Italy, $4,942,000,000; and Japan, $2,500,000,000—making a total of nearly $76,000,000,000 for the five major nations of the world, most of which is the terrible toll caused by war. Another war in the near future would ruin our rivals. No matter how much they may dislike us, all want peace.

The foundation of the favored naval legislation calling for 15 cruisers rests upon the assumption that England has far greater cruiser strength than the United States, when, in truth, according to the figures given me, if a proper allocation is made, the United States has 99,924 more tons of cruiser strength than England.

Many students of the Geneva conference are of the opinion that an agreement could have been reached if the United States had agreed to put 6-inch guns on the new type of cruiser desired. However, when it is known that the Navy kept Admiral Jones in England off and on for a period of two years in conference with certain naval officers and that all naval officers are against the reduction of ships, it can be easily understood why the disarmament conference at Geneva was the most successfully concluded of any ever held, from the standpoint of the officers in the Navy.

The naval programs so warmly advocated are really the product of the officers of the Navy and the present administration.

Congressman BRAND, of Ohio, in a speech made in the House of Representatives a few days ago, stated that 40 per cent of the laboring people in the United States at the present time are idle. According to statistics, the combined shipbuilding companies in the United States during the year 1927 turned out only 124,000 tons, in comparison with 1,225,800 tons built by England and Ireland, thus showing that England is keeping up her merchant marine, which, after all, is the most important adjunct to a navy in time of war. This bill represents a heroic effort to stimulate a serious depression in shipbuilding activities. Congressman BLAND, of Virginia, on March 16, said: "I want to call your attention to the fact that the private yards of this country are trembling on the border of absolute dissolution and starvation."

There are nearly 600 naval officers in Washington and they want not only a powerful navy but a magnificent one. They want great battleships and majestic cruisers that are better than those types in any other navy. Being human, they are probably thinking not a little of their own comfort and prestige as the men who have to live in our fighting ships and show the flag abroad.

In the third place, I am unalterably opposed to the big-Navy program because it is navally erroneous and obsolete. The kind of a Navy it contemplates can not defend our coasts or carry war to the enemy. It is not a grim fighting Navy, but a showy peace Navy.

Submarines and aircraft are the decisive weapons of modern naval warfare. With sufficient submarines we could shut off the vital supplies of any nation that dares to engage us in war. We could block the ocean lanes of commerce and close their harbors at home. With sufficient seaplanes we could make it impossible for any surface craft to approach our shores. If our big-Navy men are sincere, they ought to give us plenty of submarines and flocks of airplanes; but submarines are not pleasant living quarters, and crouching in the cockpit of a fighting plane is not so comfortable as a stroll on the quarterdeck of a great cruiser. To carry the war to enemy submarines, let us commission the 150 destroyers that are tied up at Philadelphia and San Diego, and scrap a lot of the ships that progress has made obsolete.

The best use we can make of our huge battleships is to make them airplane bases. I favor spending $18,000,000 to make every one of these 18 ships a carrier of bombing planes. That would be equivalent to extending the range of their guns to 200 miles; it would make them effective for modern warfare. That is far better than spending $19,000,000 each or more on exclusive plane carriers, and a hundred millions to elevate the guns of the battleships.

Every competent witness appearing under oath before the various aircraft committees of Congress has said that no nation can land an army on our shores as long as we have superior aircraft facilities. Therefore it would seem that the wisest policy for this Nation to pursue at the present time is to take care of its internal problems, such as flood control and the stimulation of agricultural pursuits, rather than to waste the taxpayers' money in the construction of a type of ship that probably would not be utilized in another war.

I am against the proposed big Navy because though it may be big it will be weak, because it will promote the war spirit without making for success in war, and because we can make ourselves invulnerable and insure our prosperity so far as international conflicts may affect it, reduce the terrible burden of taxation for military purposes, and get a more formidable Navy for far less money.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. DRANE, for an indefinite time, on account of important business.

LEAVE TO FILE MINORITY VIEWS ON FARM RELIEF LEGISLATION

Mr. FORT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have during the remainder of the week in which to file minority views on the bill H. R. 12687, the farm relief bill. There is no objection to this on the part of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

REGIONAL ORGANIZATION OF VETERANS' BUREAU

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on regional organization in the Veterans' Bureau.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Speaker, prior to the establishment of the Veterans' Bureau in August, 1921, and for a few months thereafter, all compensation claims were handled here in Washington—a practice which proved not only expensive and unsatisfactory but inefficient as well. With the act of 1921, cases were decentralized to fourteen district offices throughout the United States with suboffices, the district offices, however, having sole power to adjudicate claims. The World War veterans' act of June 7, 1924, authorized further decentralization to regional offices and gave them power of adjudication, a system now operating through 54 offices throughout the United States.

As evidence of the practicability of the system, I wish to insert in the RECORD a letter from Maj. Harry Gilstrap, regional manager of the United States Veterans' Bureau at Oklahoma City, whose services in that capacity since its establishment have won for him national recognition. The personal experiences of Major Gilstrap eminently qualify him for the position he now holds. Before our entrance into the war he served as captain of the First Infantry of the Oklahoma National Guard, entering the Federal service in March, 1917. A year later he was promoted to the rank of major of Infantry, serving overseas from July 31, 1918, to April 5, 1919. He now holds the rank of major in the Infantry Reserve. Major Gilstrap has the confidence and respect not only of the Oklahoma claimants with whom he comes in direct contact but of veterans and their friends throughout the country, for they recognize that he is in reality one of them, eager to give them every possible assistance, a man whose sympathy and understanding can be relied upon. He has the ability to efficiently discharge the duties of his office and the wisdom and the courage to strike at the heart of the problem, the rehabilitation of the Nation's manhood.

UNITED STATES VETERANS' BUREAU,
OFFICE OF REGIONAL MANAGER,
Oklahoma City, Okla., April 6, 1928.

Hon. M. C. GARBER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. GARBER: In a letter addressed by the Director of the Veterans' Bureau to all regional managers under date of December 23, 1927, there was contained an admirable statement of the purposes and responsibilities of the bureau and of the importance of proper attention to claimants and of the necessity of so handling the work of the bureau as to make for the bureau friends of all those dealing with the bureau through its various activities. Among the other apt statements of policy contained in the letter referred to were the following:

"We must so conduct the business of the bureau as to satisfy the Congress that its provisions are being strictly complied with, and all potential recipients of its appropriations, either of money, of insurance benefits, or of medical and surgical care, are given patient and sympathetic attention. Without this, our work will fail * * *. Manifestly, Government agencies dealing with the public and with the veteran are unable to make expenditures for the purposes of establishing good will or making friends, so it is necessary that this be accomplished by giving to those dealing with the bureau through its various activities, that type of service which, in the rendering, will bring greater confidence, make friends, and continue to hold them."

I feel sure that it will be a matter of interest to you to have definite information and evidence tending to show in what degree the regional office of the bureau in Oklahoma is succeeding in gaining confidence for the bureau and in making and holding friends for the bureau through a careful observance of the policy outlined in the foregoing quotation. It is the purpose of this communication, therefore, to submit a showing that will tend to show that the Oklahoma City regional office is in fact giving patient and sympathetic attention to all potential beneficiaries of the bureau, and also that this office is making for the bureau friends out of the claimants, the veterans' and welfare organizations, and the public generally.

To properly evaluate what has been accomplished in the way of establishing the bureau in the confidence of the veterans of this State, it may be well to note the feeling that existed toward field activities of the Veterans' Bureau prior to the establishing of the regional office at Oklahoma City. The department convention of the American Legion which was held at Bartlesville on September 14, 1922, adopted the following resolution without a dissenting vote:

"The Veterans' Bureau work in this district is characterized by delay, inefficiency, and a lack of sympathy. The policy seems to be to hinder, rather than to help, disabled men in establishing their claims. It is next to impossible to secure intelligent answers to appeals for information. Awards of compensation are reduced or discontinued without examination. Officers in positions of authority seem imbued more with the idea of saving money to the Government than extending aid to worthy disabled veterans. In selecting places for the hospitalization and vocational training of our disabled veterans there is too often an apparent consideration of building up Texas institutions rather than giving thought to the comfort, convenience, welfare, and morale of the men whose interests should be paramount. It seems to be a fixed policy that in case of doubt the decision should always be adverse to the disabled soldier. The officials of the district seem incapable of recognizing the emergency character of some cases or else unwilling to cut red tape and eliminate the delay that may endanger health and life.

"At our last department convention, S. P. Kohen was present as the representative of the Dallas office of the bureau and gave every promise of cooperation and improved service. These assurances have not been fulfilled. The decentralization of cases from the central office has been attended by delay, confusion, and endless 'passing of the buck.' We believe that S. C. Kile and S. P. Kohen are in a great degree responsible for the conditions of inefficiency and criminal neglect in this district, and we demand their removal in the interest of our disabled comrades. The conditions within the two suboffices within the State are unsatisfactory, whether as a matter of weakness, indifference, or a lack of authority, or all. If they fail in their obligations to disabled veterans through lack of courage to defy red-tape methods, if they are more concerned about holding their jobs than about ministering on behalf of the Government to the human wreckage of the World War, they are wholly unfit for the duties assigned to them. We insist upon an immediate and thorough investigation of the conditions named, and all others, with a view to fixing the responsibility and eliminating those who are responsible for the objectionable conditions and replacing them with men who will administer the law in the spirit in which the country desires it administered. We trust that such investigation will not be of the perfunctory sort that has been had when the fourteenth district officials have been permitted to investigate themselves, and we pledge the American Legion to give full cooperation in determining conditions and in finding and applying the remedy."

It will be noted that the foregoing indictment indicates a condition of affairs and a type of service on the part of bureau activities in this State which was the very opposite of that which is enjoined upon regional managers by the director's letter of December 23, 1927, as the standard to be attained.

In 1923 the department convention of the Legion was held at Lawton on September 20 and 21. At this convention a resolution was presented from the floor of the convention and adopted, the resolution criticizing the administration of the district office, and particularly the district manager and the chief of claims. I have not been able to get the exact text of this resolution, but its purport is a matter of record in central office.

The 1924 department convention was held at Ada. I have not been able to secure the record of this convention as to the resolution adopted.

The 1925 department convention, held at Pawhuska, was the first to be held after this office began to function as a regional office. At this convention on September 3, 1925, the following resolution was adopted:

"We most heartily approve the organization plan by which the Veterans' Bureau has established a department within this State, and we desire to express our satisfaction and appreciation of the thorough and efficient manner in which Maj. H. B. Gilstrap and his corps of officers have discharged their full duties in administering the affairs of the bureau in this State."

It is evident that in less than a year of existence the regional office had so won the confidence of the Legion that its official expression was practically the opposite of the estimate of two and three years before as to the work of the bureau in this State and district. That this favorable opinion continued to represent the sentiment of the American Legion in Oklahoma is shown by the adoption of the following resolution at the 1926 convention of the Legion at Ardmore on September 7:

"Whereas the first problem and care of the American Legion is the care of our sick and disabled comrades; and

"Whereas the United States Veterans' Bureau at Oklahoma City, Hospital No. 90 at Muskogee, and the Sulphur Sanitorium at Sulphur, are the mediaries through which our sick and disabled are cared for; and

"Whereas the management of these institutions has shown such high-grade efficiency, sympathy, and kindly feeling toward the disabled veterans: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the American Legion, in convention assembled, go on record as thanking Maj. Harry Gilstrap and his corps of workers of the United States Veterans' Bureau, Col. Hugh Scott and his corps of assistants of the Memorial Hospital, Doctor Wharton of the Sulphur Sanitorium and his efficient staff, for their untiring efforts, sympathy, and care given our sick and disabled comrades; be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Maj. Harry Gilstrap, Col. Hugh Scott, Doctor Wharton, and a copy to the post commander of the post at Muskogee, and a copy mailed to the press of each of the cities mentioned."

The 1927 department convention of the Legion was held at Guthrie on August 7, 8, and 9, and the attitude of the department toward the United States Veterans' Bureau was expressed in the following extract from the annual report of the department commander:

"Inasmuch as two department conventions and several district conventions of the American Legion had expressed by appropriate resolutions their confidence in the management of the Oklahoma City office of the Veterans' Bureau and their approval of the manner in which that office was serving the disabled veterans and their dependents, it was deemed best that local posts and individual claimants and their friends should handle their Veterans' Bureau problems by direct contact with the regional office. Such a plan would eliminate a duplication of work and unnecessary delay and would relieve the department headquarters of a great deal of correspondence. Accordingly, the Legion posts were requested through the Oklahoma Legionnaire, last fall to take up matters relating to compensation, hospitalization, and other bureau matters direct with the Oklahoma City office, with the assurance, however, that department headquarters would stand ready to assist if prompt and satisfactory results were not obtained. In this way department headquarters has been relieved of much work, information on bureau cases has been furnished more promptly, and complaints have been negligible. There are doubtless still many veterans with valid claims for compensation or with real need of hospitalization or medical treatment who are hesitating to contact the bureau because of past unsatisfactory experience or unfavorable reports. To all such the Oklahoma Legion would say, 'Take a chance on the Veterans' Bureau. You will receive prompt and courteous treatment and every benefit to which you are entitled under the law.' It is my observation, beginning long prior to my term of office, and my deliberate judgment, that the local regional office here, under the direction of Comrade Harry B. Gilstrap, has an administration extraordinarily able, and is, I believe, the best-managed office of its kind in the country."

Several district conventions, as stated by the department commander in the foregoing quotations, have adopted similar commendatory resolutions. All of these expressions have been entirely voluntary and without suggestion or assistance from the regional manager or any other representative of the regional office. They represent the real attitude of the American Legion in Oklahoma as to the service being rendered by the Veterans' Bureau in this State. Individual expressions from the several department commanders of the Legion will be referred to later.

The most recent action of Legion representatives as showing the attitude of the Legion in Oklahoma toward the regional office was taken at a State conference of Legion officials at Oklahoma City on December 5, 1927. This was a gathering to which every one of the two hundred and fifty-odd posts of the Legion in Oklahoma was asked to send its post commander, post adjutant, and post service officer. The conference was also attended by the department officers of the Legion and the auxiliary. Accordingly, it was a very representative gathering. National Commander Spafford, of the Legion, was present, and his making this official visit tended to bring out a large attendance. The following resolution was offered by Past Department Commander Roy Hoffman:

"Whereas we note with satisfaction the apparently universal approval of the work of the Oklahoma City regional office of the United States Veterans' Bureau on the part of the veterans and their dependents and friends, the Legion posts, the press, and the public generally; and

"Whereas this approval has been brought about, not by any sacrifice of the regular prescribed procedure, but, rather, by courtesy in contact with claimants, promptness in the handling of inquiries, thoroughness in examinations, carefulness in ratings, and clearness in the application of regulations and rating schedules; and

"Whereas the Veterans' Bureau in Oklahoma, has come to be regarded as the sympathetic friend and helper of the disabled veteran instead of an agency bent upon finding a way to deny him that which Congress sought to give him, the policy of the regional office being a correct interpretation of the spirit and purpose of our laws; and

"Whereas we believe that the zeal of the regional manager in assisting veterans is due to a genuine sympathy, born of long experience in studying their needs, and not to any apparent purpose of seeking popularity for selfish ends; and

"Whereas the exceptional morale and teamwork among the personnel of the regional office is an evidence of efficient administration and is an invaluable aid to the rendering of good service: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the representatives of the American Legion posts in Oklahoma express their confidence that the regional manager of the Oklahoma City office has never sought to exercise undue or improper influence upon the rating boards in an effort to secure ratings for claimants, and that he should not be restricted in any way with reference to his privilege of presenting to such boards any facts or arguments when he is requested so to do by claimants and their friends; and be it further

"Resolved, That it is the belief of this conference that in every regional office there should be maintained a cooperation section in which the personnel may be independent of the adjudication activities of the office to the extent that such personnel may be in a position to act as attorneys for claimants in the preparation and presentation of claims and may be in a position to challenge the correctness of any action taken which may seem to do injustice to claimants; and be it further

"Resolved, That this conference recommends that the cooperation section, formerly functioning directly under the regional manager for the purpose of assisting claimants, shall be taken from the adjudication division, so that the contact workers in this cooperation service will not be hampered or embarrassed in their efforts to assist claimants."

A motion to adopt the resolution was made by A. L. Allison, of Tulsa, member of the national executive committee of the Legion; seconded by Hugh Askew, of Enid, adjutant of Argonne Post; adopted by unanimous vote.

This resolution, adopted nearly three weeks before the issuing of the director's regional manager letter of December 23, gives credit to the Oklahoma City regional office for doing exactly the type of work outlined in the director's letter.

The files of this office contain many letters from Members of the Oklahoma congressional delegation, from representatives of posts of the American Legion and other organizations, and from individual claimants, all expressing satisfaction with the service being rendered by the regional office. Most of these letters were written in connection with individual cases and are therefore in claims files and are not available for ready reference, not having been copied or indexed, but instead being filed as part of routine correspondence. There are, however, a number of letters that are available without searching, and extracts from some of these are given herewith as showing the favorable reaction to the service being rendered by this office.

Jim Hatcher, department commander of the Legion in 1924–25, in a letter to the regional manager, dated June 29, 1925, said:

"I have been over the State in different sections, following claims and rating board around. I have heard nothing but words of praise and good words for you and your bureau.

"The boys over on the eastern side sure do like your way of running the Veterans' Bureau. When I hear these good things about you I like for you to know it."

Later in the year, as Commander Hatcher was retiring from office, he again wrote under date of September 30, 1925, as follows:

"I thank you for your kind letter of September 26. Such kind words as these are the salary and reminiscences of department commander. I can truthfully say that you gave us fine cooperation, and without the cooperative spirit shown the American Legion it could never have done what it did.

"You have been a fine legionnaire and have shown that your heart and soul were for the sick and disabled."

Bob Kerr, department commander in 1925–26, said in a letter dated February 3, 1926:

"The Legion is with you, for you, and will always stand by you."

Roy Hoffman, department commander in 1926–27, in his annual report to the department convention at Guthrie August 9, 1927, paid a tribute to the regional office which has already been quoted.

Hon. R. L. Owen, then United States Senator, under date of January 17, 1925, said in a letter to the regional manager:

"I am pleased to know that the work of the Oklahoma City regional office is functioning so well."

Hon. ELMER THOMAS, formerly Congressman from the sixth district, now United States Senator, wrote under date of May 11, 1925:

"I am delighted to know that my district has been cleaned up so well and that there are less than 100 ex-service men who have not been reached and entirely satisfied through the activities of your bureau.

"I assure you that I am well pleased with the service received and the consideration given the boys whom I have been privileged to present for your consideration."

Under date of July 1, 1926, Senator W. B. PINE wrote to the regional manager as follows:

"Your plan of going into the several counties and reaching those veterans and dependents who do not know their rights under the law is good work, and I believe that it should be continued.

"My work on the Military Affairs Committee brings me in contact with Civil and Spanish-American War cases. We are far removed from the close of these wars, and exact facts in connection with service records are hard to establish. It is plain to me that now is the time to clear up the records and establish the rights of World War veterans and their dependents."

Hon. E. B. HOWARD, Representative from the first congressional district, wrote under date of January 17, 1925:

"It is a great relief to me to know that your office is now in position to act on claims of Oklahoma men. I am also delighted to know that you are in charge of the office there, and feel sure that the boys will have no complaints to make of the treatment given them by your office."

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS, Representative from the second congressional district, wrote under date of April 17, 1925:

"I am very much interested in the plans you outlined and believe that if such authority were granted that it would enable your bureau to give more correct rating for all claimants for compensation and would also result in a much better feeling on the part of ex-service men toward the Veterans' Bureau and the Government."

Hon. C. D. Carter, then Representative from the third congressional district, wrote under date of May 1, 1925:

"I wish to congratulate you upon this good work and assure you of my hearty cooperation in bringing these matters to a speedy conclusion."

Hon. TOM D. MCKEOWN, Representative from the fourth congressional district, wrote under date of October 24, 1927:

"Permit me to express my sincere appreciation to you and your department for the splendid work you are doing for my boys in the fourth district. I wish to take this opportunity before going back to Washington to express my thanks for this splendid work, and any time you are in Washington this winter I will be glad to see you."

Hon. F. B. SWANK, Representative from the fifth congressional district, wrote under date of January 19, 1925:

"I am sure the establishment of this regional office, with you as the regional manager, will be a great assistance to our soldiers in Oklahoma."

Hon. J. V. MCCLINTIC, Representative from the seventh congressional district, wrote under date of December 21, 1925:

"I am very appreciative of the pains you have always taken in looking after the cases coming from the seventh district, and I hope it will not be necessary to bother you in the very near future."

Hon. M. G. GARBER, Representative from the eighth congressional district, wrote under date of January 19, 1925:

"It should be a source of constant satisfaction to you to know in what high regard you are held by your country as well as by all these boys in whose behalf you are expending your efforts. We are under great obligations to these boys who gave so freely and so cheerfully when their country called, and it is an obligation toward the meeting of which the effective functioning of the Veterans' Bureau is a big step. Oklahoma is to be congratulated upon having at her command the services of a man of your character and proven ability."

Under date of August 13, 1927, Congressman GARBER again wrote to the regional manager as follows:

"Oklahoma veterans are very fortunate indeed in having at the head of their bureau a man who is so genuinely interested in their problems and who is capable of administering the law in a sympathetic, intelligent manner."

Mrs. M. L. Opperud, department president of the American Legion Auxiliary for 1927, wrote under date of April 29, 1927:

"Certainly want to thank you for the address you gave at the recent conference in Oklahoma City in honor of Mrs. Adalin W. Macauley, our national president.

"I feel sure that Mrs. Macauley was favorably impressed with the work of the Veterans' Bureau in this department.

"Please call on the American Legion Auxiliary if we can be of any assistance to you in your work"

David J. Wenner, liaison officer of the D. A. V. W. W. at the Soldiers' Tubercular Sanitorium at Sulphur, wrote, under date of December 24, 1927:

"It is with the greatest of pleasure that I have this opportunity to offer to you and to all of the employees of the bureau at your office a most sincere wish for a truly merry Christmas and a most happy New Year on behalf of the patients at this hospital.

"Also I wish to express our appreciation of the spirit of cooperation and helpfulness that you and your office have shown to all of us throughout the past 12 months."

M. R. Harrison, chairman of the soldiers' relief commission, wrote under date of February 14, 1928:

"I, on behalf of the commission, want to express our sincere thanks and appreciation of the wonderful service rendered the Commission and the disabled soldiers of the Soldiers' Tubercular Hospital at Sulphur in our little upheaval just past, and I want you to know that we deeply appreciate further the kind of a man you gave us in Doctor Rhodes, one of the finest men I believe I have ever met, and, as I told the doctor, a 'real pinch hitter.'"

This office has a collection of nearly 1,000 newspaper clippings, ranging from a single paragraph to a full-page illustrated story in the Sunday Oklahoman, all presenting in a commendatory way the work done by the Veterans' Bureau in Oklahoma through the Oklahoma City regional office.

The foregoing quotations are only samples of the complimentary utterances concerning our work in Oklahoma. There have been many other expressions equally favorable, but it is believed that the evidence that has been submitted herein will show that this office is rendering service in strict accordance with the high standard outlined in the director's letter of December 23, 1927.

Very truly yours,

H. B. GILSTRAP,
Regional Manager, Oklahoma City, Okla.

ERADICATION OF EUROPEAN CORN BORER

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 12632) to provide for the eradication or control of the European corn borer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa calls up the bill H. R. 12632, which is on the Union Calendar. The House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. KETCHAM, will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12632, with Mr. KETCHAM in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for one hour.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be recognized in control of the time in opposition to this bill if no member of the committee opposes it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is any member of the committee opposed to the bill? If not, the gentleman from Washington will be recognized to control time in opposition to the bill.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, the purpose of this bill, which authorizes, if passed, an appropriation of $7,000,000 to be expended by the Department of Agriculture under certain limitations set up in the bill, is to carry on for another year the campaign against the European corn borer. In order that the membership of the House may have some further information as to what was done with the $10,000,000 which was appropriated by Congress last year and used in connection with the corn-borer campaign, I have set out in the report which I have filed with this bill and incorporate here a brief summary of those expenditures:

Corn-borer clean-up appropriation, 1927–28—Expenditures to March 31, 1928

Salaries in Washington	$77,660.04

Communication service (telephone and telegraph)	8,562.46
Travel expenses (transportation and subsistence)	161,344.74
Printing and photographing	6,001.75
Transportation of things	17,496.71
Storage of motor vehicles	4,217.18
Advertising and publication of notices	56.98
Heat, light, power, water, and electricity	4,043.54
Rents, buildings, land, etc	26,337.15
Repairs and alterations to buildings and machinery	123,415.89
Miscellaneous expenses	243.24
Reimbursement to farmers	4,251,656.96
Equipment (machinery, furniture, automobiles, etc.)	2,394,940.92
	8,990,461.82
Unexpended balance	1,009,538.18
Total of appropriation	10,000,000.00
Against the unexpended balance of	1,009,538.18
There are liabilities amounting to	156,194.78
Unobligated balance (including $153,250 held in Secretary's office unallotted)	853,343.40

The bill as I introduced it this year authorized an appropriation of $10,000,000, a like sum to that carried last year, but in view of the fact that we still have intact and in good condition in the neighborhood of $2,000,000 worth of machinery which was purchased last year, and in view of the further fact that there is in round numbers a million dollars left of that fund, the committee in its wisdom reduced the amount to $7,000,000 authorized in the bill.

Two important provisos are added to this bill which were not carried in the bill of last year. One of those provisos reads as follows:

Provided, That no part of the appropriation herein authorized shall be expended for the purchase of new machinery unless the Secretary of Agriculture deems such expenditure necessary by reason of an emergency, and in such case an amount not to exceed 1 per cent may be so expended.

The purpose of that, of course, is to meet the fear which arose in the minds of many Members of Congress and throughout the country that there would be additional and unwarranted expenditures for machinery. The second proviso, which is of importance and new in this particular bill, is as follows:

Provided further, That an amount not to exceed 9 per cent of the appropriation herein authorized may be expended for the employment of persons and means in the District of Columbia and elsewhere and all other necessary expenses other than necessary expenses for farm clean-up incidental to such eradication or control.

In other words, not more than 1 per cent is to be expended in any event for farm machinery, and not more than 9 per cent is to be expended for what may be termed overhead expenses, leaving a balance of 90 per cent which is to be used for reimbursement to farmers who do work in connection with this clean-up campaign, which is not incident to regular farm practices.

Now, let me say, gentlemen, in the beginning, that the vital question at issue in this whole matter before the committee and before the House is the expenditure of the 90 per cent of this appropriation, which, as I say, goes to the individual farmers in and along the periphery of this infested area for such work as they may do which is regarded as extra in addition to their regular farm practices and not usually done by thrifty farmers in connection with their farming operations. It is the position taken by our committee; also by the farm organizations of the country, and the interests in the Middle West, particularly in the Corn Belt, which is threatened by the corn borer, that if these farmers on the edge of the infested area are called upon to conduct unusual and unnecessary clean-up campaigns in connection with the holding back of this pest, which not only threatens the Corn Belt but the livestock industry and agriculture itself, they shall be reimbursed out of the Federal Treasury for that work which is extra and which they would not otherwise do. In other words, we feel that they should be reimbursed for doing that which is not done down in the sections not affected by the corn borer, if by so doing they hold the borer in check. In other words, we regard this as a national rather than a local problem. Recognizing the menace of the corn borer and the threat which it holds not only over the Corn Belt but the livestock industry and agriculture itself, we feel that out of the Treasury should come this extra pay for this extra labor which they otherwise would not be called upon to do and would not do.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. What is the technical work against the corn borer? It is quite a lot of money you are asking for.

Mr. PURNELL. It seems quite a lot of money. Last year there was expended over $4,000,000 in reimbursement to the farmers in this infested area, who, under the direction of the Department of Agriculture and in cooperation with the States, cleaned up their barnyards, their fields, and their fence rows, so that all possible places of hibernation might be destroyed. In many instances with their wives and children they picked up these cornstalks in baskets by hand and burned them, so that no hiding place for the corn borer should be left on the farms in the areas which were to be cleaned up. It was the only way by which the spread could be retarded. Does that answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I know very little about it. Of course, I would like to know more about it. The only way this pest is conveyed is by these old cornstalks? Is that correct?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes. I think the only possible opposition to this bill may be in sections where they use products of the corn. It does not come from the farmers themselves. The corn borer came over to this country in 1916 or perhaps a little earlier. It came over in a shipment of broom corn, presumably from Austria. From that shipment of broom corn containing a small quantity of corn borers we have seen grow and develop hundreds of millions of corn borers. They spread westward and destroyed almost in toto the corn crop in Canada north of Lake Erie. Those corn borers found their way, when in the moth stage, across Lake Erie, and infested the border line south of Lake Erie in the United States. Marked moths have been known to fly as far as 25 miles. It is assumed that they fly farther than that.

The moth lays her eggs under the leaf of the growing corn, and within a few days, perhaps five or six, they hatch into active and hungry corn borers. The female moth deposits 40 or 50 eggs at a time. The borer first feeds on the leaf of the corn and as soon as it is strong enough goes into the stalk. When they have reached the corn-borer stage they live in that form throughout the winter. I have been told on good authority that they can survive in a cake of ice. They can survive in the water. I think they have been soaked for perhaps more than 80 hours in a saturated salt solution and still came out alive. They live in these cornstalks throughout the winter. In the spring time they emerge in the form of a moth and lay their eggs and raise a new crop.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes.

Mr. ALMON. Do they live in the stalk, and do they cause the stalk to die by boring into the stalk?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes. Of course, it requires more than one or two borers to produce commercial damage. The question is, What is commercial damage? It is a mooted question. The State entomologist from my own State, Mr. Frank N. Wallace, for whose opinion I have the very highest regard, made the statement before our committee that 1 per cent infestation produces commercial damage. Ten or twelve corn borers in a stalk will not only produce commercial damage but will destroy it.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. In what stage do they attack the stalk—before the ear is set or afterwards?

Mr. PURNELL. Before the ear is set.

Now, as I said a moment ago, we have $2,000,000 of machinery, in round figures, and we have approximately a million dollars left of the $10,000,000 appropriated last year, and the committee felt that for the purpose of carrying on this clean-up campaign for another year $7,000,000 would be sufficient.

Let me say here, lest I forget it, that this is not to be a continuing policy. This policy of paying farmers for the extra labor done on their farms is, in a sense, a new one, but until the farmers in the infested area and on the border of infestation can be taught how to combat the corn borer, how to adapt themselves to new methods of farming, new methods of diversification and new methods of clean-up, we in the Agricultural Committee of the House felt that we ought to assist them at least one more year in bringing about this change.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. In this clean-up you speak of, what becomes of the rubbish? Is it burned or how is it destroyed?

Mr. PURNELL. Most of it is burned. Some new machinery has been invented which cuts the stalks down very close to the ground, but most of it is burned and, of course, a great deal of the stalks are plowed under.

Mr. MILLER. Just another question. A great deal of corn in the Central West, used in connection with cattle raising, is what they call shock corn, which is cut up and fed to livestock. Is all of that rubbish cleaned up and are all of the stalks in the fields where that corn is cut eradicated?

Mr. PURNELL. If they are within this particular area that the Department of Agriculture and the State decides to clean up, it is all taken out and burned, plowed under, or otherwise destroyed.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. In the section the gentleman speaks of is it not found necessary to clean up more than the corn itself? Is it not necessary to destroy the stalk, because these insects, or whatever they are, live in any kind of grain or vegetation that has a hollow stalk, so that they have to be cleaned up in other places than in the corn itself—is not that true?

Mr. PURNELL. It might be interesting to the Members of the House to know that the corn borer will actually attack in the neighborhood of 200 kinds of vegetation, but by a strange coincidence in its make-up it seems to know how to select corn and confines its operations almost exclusively to corn until the corn is gone. Therein lies the threat to other sections of the country. In addition to our great Corn Belt which we are trying to protect, we are constantly under the threat that when this corn borer passes on further, on to the Mississippi, the Ohio, and the Wabash Rivers, it may be carried down even to the sections of the South where cotton is raised. Of course, one stalk of cotton can not hope to carry very long as many corn borers as are frequently found on a stalk of corn. I might say that stalks of corn in the infested area have been found to contain as many as 200 corn borers.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the gentleman explain why so many farmers are opposed to this appropriation?

Mr. PURNELL. The gentleman from Ohio asks me why so many farmers are opposed to this appropriation, and I will say this: My conviction is that there are not many farmers opposed to it. A few farmers, however, who live in the thinly infested areas along the fringe, who have been called upon to do work that they regard as unnecessary, are objecting. I can see how a man who lives on a thinly infested fringe of this area might not be able to understand and see the wisdom of picking up cornstalks and subjecting himself to certain regulations which are imposed upon him by the Federal and State Governments. But certainly in my section of the country, in Indiana, in Illinois, in Iowa, and in that section where they have no corn borers, the farmers are not opposed to this. They will be very happy, indeed, to have the good folks up in Ohio, in the northeast corner of Indiana, and up in Michigan retard this pest, so that it can not come upon us.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask what justification the farmers have for saying that by proper farming they can eradicate the corn borer without this assistance from the State and Federal Governments?

Mr. PURNELL. Well, I will say that some very good farmers came before our committee from the gentleman's own State and stated that by new and improved and clean methods of farming they could take care of this clean-up campaign themselves; but herein lies the danger of that: A half dozen good farmers on the edge of the infested area may carry on a proper clean-up campaign, but their efforts will be wasted if 25 other farmers in the same county who do not believe in it or who are poor farmers will not make a like clean up. Certainly it would not be fair for a few farmers in this infested fringe to properly clean up their farms and have their neighbors on adjoining farms do nothing. That would not result in retarding the spread of the corn borer at all but leave the whole program in a state of chaos.

Mr. THURSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes.

Mr. THURSTON. The map displayed by the Member indicates that there is a large area which is affected in Canada. Will the gentleman explain the extent of the Canadian Government's cooperation in this movement?

Mr. PURNELL. The whole trouble lies in the fact that the Canadian Government did not take hold of this thing in time. When the corn borer first appeared in Canada, for some unknown reason which I am not able to explain, funds were not available from the Canadian Government for a campaign against the corn borer. The result was that it got away from them and their entire corn crop in the area which lies north of Lake Erie was entirely wiped out, and with it went the hog industry. The hog business has absolutely been ruined in that area as well as the corn industry.

Mr. CARSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes.

Mr. CARSS. Has the Department of Agriculture worked out a successful method of combating this pest?

Mr. PURNELL. The Department of Agriculture did two things. First, it carried on this clean-up campaign on the edge of the infested areas.

Mr. CARSS. I merely wanted to know if this money is required to carry on further experiments; in other words, are not the efforts which they have made up to date in an experimental state?

Mr. PURNELL. Of course, the whole thing is more or less in an experimental state. Secondly, they are breeding in a number of laboratories pests which they have imported from Europe and which seek out the corn borer and destroy it.

Mr. TUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes.

Mr. TUCKER. Does this bill provide that officers of the Government can go on a man's farm, if they find this pest there, and require him under this law to clean up?

Mr. PURNELL. The officer gives him an opportunity to do it, and if it is not done by a certain time the Department of Agriculture will do the cleaning itself and charge it up to him.

Mr. BUCHANAN. If the gentleman will permit, that is done, of course, under State authority.

Mr. PURNELL. That is true. That is all done under the State law, but nevertheless it is done. You understand the Federal Government and the State work in cooperation. A maximum of $2 per acre was paid by the Government when the individual farmer cleaned his own land. If he did not clean it, the Government had to go in and do it under State regulations and charge it up to the land. It could not be done otherwise.

Mr. MEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. I yield.

Mr. MEAD. One reason I believe this legislation ought to be passed at this time is that the Federal department, I believe the gentleman will agree, is working in harmony with State departments and they have the sympathetic support of the Canadian Government. They are all working together with the local authorities taking the upper hand in the matter and working in conjunction with the Federal Government.

Mr. PURNELL. That is true.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I understand the Department of Agriculture is against this appropriation. Will the gentleman tell us how he arrived at a conclusion different from that of the department?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes; I will say the Department of Agriculture is not opposed to this appropriation; in fact, the report which is filed with the bill itself is the report which was prepared by the Department of Agriculture. I did not change a line in it. I will explain to the gentleman why there is an apparent——

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Was not that their attitude at the time the appropriation bill was brought in by the Committee on Appropriations? There was upward of $1,000,000 appropriated for work similar to this or, rather, for work which the Department of Agriculture had outlined for itself, and it did not ask for any more money.

Mr. PURNELL. The gentleman is quite right about that.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I am not speaking in opposition to the proposition, because I propose to vote for it, but I would like to have the reason for the difference between the gentleman and the department.

Mr. PURNELL. I will be very pleased to tell the gentleman.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. And the course of reasoning by which the gentleman reached his conclusion.

Mr. PURNELL. The course of reasoning by which I reached my conclusion is that the Department of Agriculture takes the position that this question of paying money to farmers for extra work done in this clean-up campaign is one of policy which should be settled by the Congress itself.

Mr. FLETCHER. Rather than by the State?

Mr. PURNELL. Rather than by the department. In other words, if the Congress feels that we ought to continue for another year this matter of paying individual farmers wages not to exceed $2 per acre, as was done last year for extra work which they do, that is not incident to their regular farm practice, the result of which is to keep the corn borer out of the Corn Belt and protect those of us in other States and areas who have not got it, and thereby protect the whole Nation, it is a question of policy for the Congress to determine rather than the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. I am anxious to know whether the investigation and experiments along this line have brought out whether or not the corn borer would be stopped by the difference in climate which exists in the Southern States, and whether it could grow and survive our long summers there. The gentleman brought out very well that it would withstand cold even to the freezing point.

Mr. PURNELL. My judgment is that it will withstand heat just as well as it will cold, although I am not prepared to say, and I do not know that experiments have been carried on to that extent. But I do know that this pest will attack more than 200 kinds of vegetation, and that if it once destroys our corn crop and floats down the river, in cornstalks or otherwise, we will have a resulting damage in other areas.

Mr. GREEN. Would a field of corn that was infested in a bad way with this borer be completely ruined, or what would be the percentage of decrease in the yield?

Mr. PURNELL. The yield will decrease in proportion to the increase of the corn borer. It is my understanding that there were a number of fields in the infested area last year that had four or five corn borers to the stalk which had not yet produced commercial damage, but when you proceed above that you reach the stage that was reached in Canada, where they had sometimes as many as 200 in a stalk, until at last the entire area was decimated.

Mr. GREEN. In that case there would be an 80 or 90 per cent decrease in production.

Mr. PURNELL. Yes; I would say from 80 to 90 per cent.

Mr. CARSS. Has the gentleman any figures to show the amount the yield has been lessened by this pest?

Mr. PURNELL. I would say there has been no appreciable commercial damage done in the United States as yet. If a few years ago when this corn borer first came over here——

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I was just going to ask if there had been any damage done here.

Mr. PURNELL. I would say no appreciable damage has been done yet.

Mr. CARSS. That is one reason I am for the bill. We want to stop this pest before it does commercial damage.

Mr. PURNELL. And I will say that a few years ago if one-half of $10,000,000 had been appropriated and as wisely used as the last $10,000,000 was used we would not have this threat to-day.

Mr. COLE of Iowa and Mr. CHALMERS rose.

Mr. PURNELL. I yield first to the gentleman from Iowa, who, I believe, was on his feet first.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I simply wanted to answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Florida by stating that in Europe this pest has been found in the warm countries. It grows in the far South, and I think heat would not interfere with its propagation.

Mr. CHALMERS. I want to remind the gentleman that this dangerous pest likes sweet corn particularly and I know personally that there has been commercial loss in raising sweet corn.

Mr. HUDSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. I yield.

Mr. HUDSON. While the gentleman from Indiana stated that there had been no appreciable loss as a commercial prospect, he meant the entire Nation?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes. I am not attempting to speak of separate communities. I was speaking about the appreciable damage to the corn crop of the country as a whole. I say there has been no appreciable damage to the corn crop of the Nation.

Mr. CHALMERS. Except the sweet corn?

Mr. ALMON. The gentleman says it came into the United States from Canada. What did they do about it in Canada?

Mr. PURNELL. I made that statement at the beginning of my remarks. Perhaps the gentleman was not here. They did nothing, for the reason no money was available and no program worked out, and it got away from them.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. I will.

Mr. ARENTZ. You have colored zones on the map next to Lake Erie. You have a mottled color, then orange, red, blue, and green. If what the gentleman says is true, that there has been no commercial damage, I do not understand why it has not, in view of the fact that the corn borer is already in the red area, and that that has been infested for several years. Has not the corn borer destroyed the growth of corn in that red area?

Mr. PURNELL. It would not destroy it even if it were in the red area since 1925.

Mr. ARENTZ. The gentleman said there had been no commercial damage.

Mr. PURNELL. Not to the whole corn crop of the Nation. I was not alluding to any community or State, but as a national proposition.

Mr. MEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. I yield.

Mr. MEAD. As one who lives in an infested area, I want to say that the damage there is great. The corn is of no value for sale in hotels or residences, because as soon as they learn that it is infested with the corn borer they do not want it. The housewives do not want it.

Mr. PURNELL. The gentleman speaks of sweet corn?

Mr. MEAD. Yes. The other corn is a loss for the farmer; if he is patriotic he destroys it, so it is a total loss to him. Coming from an infested area, I want to say that the borer occasions a great loss, and if this legislation is not passed it will be a great loss to the Nation.

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. The gentleman has brought out the facts in the case in a very interesting way. Now, as a member of the Agricultural Committee, I hope that his committee in the course of time, when we present a little matter for relief of the pecan industry, will carefully consider it.

Mr. PURNELL. I think the gentleman will agree that the Agricultural Committee of the House is not sectional when it comes to considering and reporting bills. We have tried to regard agriculture and every phase of it as a matter of national concern and not as a local or sectional problem.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. I yield.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. The statement has been made that this borer affects the ear of the corn. That is a mistake. That is a different worm. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that this worm does not affect the ear but affects the stalk.

Mr. PURNELL. I am not so sure about that. I want to say to the gentleman from Washington, it enters the stalk of corn first, but I would not say that it does not affect the ear. I confess I have not gone into that subject very fully.

Mr. HUDSON. If we had samples here on the desk you would readily see that the corn borer deprives the ear of nutriment, and the ear does suffer because the stalk is destroyed.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield to myself 15 minutes. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, let me make this statement to begin with. I recognize that corn is the great agricultural crop of the United States, and if this were a question of appropriating $50,000,000 to save the corn growers of the United States from a real menace I should be for the bill.

I want to discuss the European corn borer on the authority of Doctor Marlatt, head of the Bureau of Entomology in the Department of Agriculture. He says that the European corn borer is doing little damage in Europe and only in certain circumscribed parts of that continent. It came to this country in broom corn 19 years ago. There were four points of infestation—one near Boston, two in New York, and one over in Canada. So it had 19 years the start of the scientists.

We began one year ago to try to control it, so that for 18 years it had its way. Over in Canada they grow corn year after year without any clean-up system, so that it became a real menace there; and so it will become any place where they grow corn year after year and do not cut the corn for the silo, burn the stalks, or plow them under. When they do that, the testimony before the subcommittee on agricultural appropriations is to the effect that it does not do any commercial damage. It has done some commercial damage up in Canada, because they do not farm there as we do down in the States. It was also revealed in the testimony that this corn borer belongs in ground with a high water table. That is, wet ground, so in the low, rather swampy ground in the neighborhood of Boston it did considerable damage. It has never done any damage in the State of New York to amount to anything, according to the department of agriculture of that State.

When this corn-borer problem came to my knowledge last year I was frightened. I thought that the greatest farm industry of the United States, the corn-growing industry, was menaced. I readily voted for the $10,000,000 appropriation and I would vote for $50,000,000 to-day if it were a necessity, if it were important, but I want you to know what the men who have been administering the law down in the Department of Agriculture, and the men who will administer it if we authorize this appropriation and it is finally made, have to say. The testimony is rather voluminous. I have been able only to pick out a few statements in this limited time, and I shall quote some expressions which I think will give you a good general idea of their attitude. I might say that the attitude of the scientists in the department, either in the record or out of the record, I am not sure which, but as expressed in our committee room was to the effect that they did not expect any sum of this kind for continued clean-up work over the United States, but that they were well pleased with the work that they had done last year, as a demonstration to the farmer as to how the work should be done, and in the agricultural appropriation bill we are carrying something over $1,000,000 for continuing the investigational and quarantine and scout work, and so forth.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes; I yield.

Mr. PURNELL. We are not carrying anything, however, in that bill for reimbursement to the farmer.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. No.

Mr. PURNELL. That is the purpose of this bill.

The research work in the Department of Agriculture should be regularly done and carried on. This is a question of whether or not we will reimburse the farmer, as was done last year, for labor performed.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. If there was a menace to the industry, we would be justified in going to almost any length in my opinion, but I expect to prove to you by the scientific men in that department that you do not have such a menace, and it is for each and every Member of Congress to decide whether or not we should make this authorization.

I am appearing here in opposition, because so much of this came out in the hearings before the subcommittee of which I am a member, and not because I am hostile or anything of the kind. I think you gentlemen are entitled to the information which I hope to give to you.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes.

Mr. HUDSON. Does the gentleman infer that the department does not consider this a menace to the corn growing of the Nation?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. If we were to farm as they do in Canada it would be.

Mr. HUDSON. What does the department mean when it uses the following language:

> This is an effort to retard the spread of an insect pest that is generally believed to constitute a menace to the corn crop of the country.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It is generally so considered, but that belief is not justified by the facts.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. THURSTON. The gentleman stated that if we were to pursue the same policy in the Corn Belt that has been pursued in Canada a great loss would occur.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes.

Mr. THURSTON. And the gentleman also stated that they do clean up in the Mississippi Valley and burn their cornstalks?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes; that is quite common in Indiana, the State where I was born and used to farm, and in Illinois, where I lived for many years.

Mr. THURSTON. I say it would be a rare instance to travel around over the State of Iowa and find that a corn shock or cornstalks had been burned. We plow under those cornstalks as a fertilizer, or if we do not do that we put them in the silo for silage. We utilize the cornstalks, and in no instance do we burn them.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I am very glad that the gentleman brought that to my attention. There are two ways of getting rid of the corn borer. One is to in some way destroy the cornstalks, either use them for silage or burn them in order to simply get rid of them. That is a very common practice in Illinois. The other way is to plow them under. Those are the ways to get rid of the corn borer.

Mr. CARSS. Does that kill the corn borer?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. He dies in the course of time if plowed under.

Mr. CARSS. Would he survive the winter and come up again?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. You would have to keep him under for several months.

Mr. HUDSON. You have to plow him under pretty deep. Light plowing would not do it.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It does not make any difference, so long as the stalks are covered, according to the testimony that has been given.

Mr. CARSS. What do the department experts say in regard to killing the borer? Do they claim that plowing under will destroy it?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes; by plowing and by burning; either method.

Mr. CARSS. If they are plowed under, are they destroyed?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes. When you plow them under they are destroyed.

Mr. THURSTON. I understand that when they plow them under only part of them are destroyed.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Money is already provided in the appropriation bill for the prevention of the spread of the European corn borer, the enforcement of the quarantine, and the clean-up of heavily infested areas in order to prevent the further long-distance spread of this insect; $1,257,580 that is recommended for all research and regulatory work together, there being an item of $150,000 for miscellaneous work. Again, Doctor Marlatt says:

> The department does not believe that, merely as a demonstration of the value of clean-up, such expenditures are warranted.

This refers to such a sum as we are now considering.

In this clean-up campaign last year these are some of the expenditures that were made:

Personal services	$1,318,029.05
Supplies and materials	340,722.98
Communication	6,194.85
Travel expense	105,063.02
Repairs and alterations of buildings	50,474.96
Reimbursement to farmers	4,213,990.46
848 trucks	749,101.17
75 coupes and 9 sedans	52,050.00
Oil-burning apparatus	481,552.90
1,240 tractors	740,041.76

Miscellaneous field equipment are these:

Corn binders, low cutting		27
Ensilage cutters		3
Oil hose	feet	3,750
Oil hose, pressure	feet	138,000
Oil-burning carriages		200
Plows, tractor, 3-gang		450
Stubble pulverizers		800
Tractor and plow skids	pairs	195
Trailers, 2-wheel		25
Trailers, 4-wheel, 5-ton		64

Total, $302,103.36.

Total for major items, $2,324,848.29.

Mr. CARSS. I see the largest item mentioned in this report is $4,261,000 for reimbursement to the farmer. That is the largest single item of expenditure?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes. That is for reimbursement.

Mr. CARSS. That is to induce the farmers to cooperate in stamping out this pest. You have already got the equipment, but it will be necessary to reimburse the farmers in cooperating with the Government and stamping out this pest. I think that shows the necessity of this appropriation.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Some of the infested territory has been infested for 19 years. Quoting again from Doctor Marlatt, I read:

> We have, therefore, as to the centers of these infestations, a period of 19 years of opportunity for the corn borer. Taking up the various points of infestation in the United States, the records indicate that actual damage has resulted in only a very trifling percentage of the areas now covered, and such damage has apparently been limited to peculiar soil conditions described, perhaps somewhat generally and perhaps not altogether adequately, as concerned with a high-water table. In the New England area, for example, noticeable or appreciable crop damage has been limited to a very small portion of the area infested.

Again, he says:

> In other words, for the most part to low areas, much of it marshy and with high-water table within a short radius of the city of Boston. The general spread throughout a great portion of New England involving portions of Maine, New Hampshire, Connecticut, and Rhode Island has been characterized by no important or appreciable damage. In the eastern New York area spreading out from Schenectady there has been no real damage of any type, as I was recently advised by the director of agriculture of that State, and over a good deal of this area the corn borer has been present for a good many years and in the center of the area for 19 years. As to the western area, including western New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan, the appreciable damage is limited to a very narrow strip along Lake Erie and Lake Michigan, all within 5 miles of the lake. This is the hopeful phase of the situation. In presenting this situation as to areas which have been infested for some time without loss to the farmer, I do not mean to give the impression that if the borer continues there will be no damage.
> It is possible that in southern Indiana and Illinois we may have heavy damage. The department does not believe that this insect presents a negligible problem. We believe that it is a very important pest, so important that we have asked twice as much money for combating it as we have asked in the case of any other insect, and we think that the sum we ask is reasonable and legitimate under the present circumstances.

And that amount, $1,250,000, is all included in the appropriation bill. He says that is what they think is necessary.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. You answered the question asked of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL] as to the area of infestation. It is possible, covering the blue and red areas on the map, that thousands of square miles will be covered. Has the borer been doing particular damage in that area of a thousand square miles?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. No; it has not. I have been giving you the testimony of the man in whose bureau this is administered. The only place where the damage has been of any great consequence is down around the lake here [indicating] and a little here [indicating].

Mr. HUDSON. Will not the gentleman concede that that might be true at this time, but he says it is such a pest to these other areas that he has asked more than he ever asked before.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes; and that has been appropriated. That has no reference to this bill. This bill was introduced on April 2 and reported out on April 6. I tried to get hold of a copy of the hearings, but I find that for some reason or other the committee hearings are not available. They are not in print. But I understand neither the Department of Agriculture nor the Budget recommends this bill.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. How far south has the borer proceeded?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. If this map is correct—and I think it was made by the department——

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. How far down does that go?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It extended a little more than halfway from north to south through Ohio.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes.

Mr. HUDSON. In regard to the menace and this appropriation, which he says the department thinks is necessary to curb the menace, that makes provision for the farmers' help in the eradication. This is for the farmers' help? That was for the department?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Again we asked:

You have had the corn borer for 18 years?

Doctor WOODS. Yes, sir.

Now, please listen to this, if you will:

How much damage was done by the corn borer last year?

This is Doctor Woods, the head scientist of the Department of Agriculture.

Practically none in the United States.

Now, gentlemen, I do not want you to get the wrong viewpoint. If this is something that is necessary, I want it just as much as my friend PURNELL, but the testimony which came before my committee does not indicate that this appropriation is justifiable, in my opinion, and I am presenting the facts in order that you may judge for yourselves.

Mr. PURNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes.

Mr. PURNELL. There never came before your committee that great body of high-class representative farmers from Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan who appeared before the Agricultural Committee in support of the bill.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. There was a large delegation that came from those three States.

Mr. PURNELL. I will state that probably the gentleman's judgment has been warped by reason of the fact that a delegation came from the State of Ohio opposing this legislation.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. They were very much opposing it, and they were all corn growers.

Mr. PURNELL. And we had them before our committee.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. But at that time I was opposed to the attitude of the visiting committee, and I only took a different attitude after I had heard all that the scientific men had to say. Will the gentleman at this point tell us why we could not have the committee hearings, so that we might have the advantage of the information given to the gentleman's committee? I am intensely interested in this matter.

Mr. PURNELL. I am sorry they are not available, because I am satisfied they would give the gentleman a lot of information that he seems to be lacking relative to this appropriation.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. At least, the corn borer does not get up into the ear of the corn.

Mr. PURNELL. I am not so sure about that.

Mr. ADKINS. If the gentleman will come to my office I will show him one.

Mr. PURNELL. I will say to the gentleman that the reason the hearings are not available is that they have not been corrected and are not printed.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I know they are not printed, though almost two weeks have elapsed.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. I would like to ask the gentleman what the complaint of the farmers from northwestern Ohio was before his committee or the Agricultural Committee with reference to the corn-borer campaign in Ohio?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I do not know what part of the State of Ohio it came from, but there was a large committee of farmers, of corn growers from the State of Ohio that came before the Agricultural Appropriations Committee. After learning their grievance we referred them on over to the Agricultural Committee. But they objected to the way the law was administered, that they could solve the problem themselves, that it was not a menace, that it was not damaging, and that the clean-up had been handled in a very high-handed and disagreeable fashion. That was their complaint.

Mr. MURPHY. Then, the objection that came from northwestern Ohio was largely one of administration? Is that the gentleman's judgment?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Well, they objected, and the committee from Michigan, too, to the method of administration, and they also insisted and the department itself says it is a problem that the farmer himself must finally take care of.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has again expired.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself five additional minutes.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. Does the gentleman know that the committee from Putnam County, Ohio, which came from his committee to the Committee on Agriculture, announced with a great deal of pride that that committee was a political committee pure and simple, and nothing else?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. That they themselves were a political committee?

Mr. ASWELL. They announced that they were a political committee pure and simple, and nothing else.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I did not know that.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman say what he means by a political committee?

Mr. ASWELL. You will have to ask the chairman about that. I mean the chairman of that committee from Putnam County.

Mr. MURPHY. He said it was a political committee?

Mr. ASWELL. That it was a political organization; that he was the head of it, and that it had controlled a million votes in the last election.

Mr. MURPHY. Was he against the corn borer?

Mr. ASWELL. Well, he attempted to make capital out of this fight, saying that he wanted economy in the country, and that he had controlled a million votes in the last election.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Does that apply to the Representative from Michigan who was with that committee?

Mr. ASWELL. He might have been along. If he was with the Putnam County man, he was there I am sure. Now, does the gentleman from Washington grow corn in his country?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. We do not grow much corn out in the State of Washington, but I am interested in Illinois, in Indiana, and in the corn sections because my beloveds live there.

Mr. ASWELL. Then it seems to me the gentleman should be interested in checking the corn borer.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It is stated in our hearings at more than one place that nobody in the United States who is familiar with the subject believes it can be checked; that it is going to spread over the country, but by clean farming it can be prevented from doing damage.

Mr. ASWELL. That is not at all in harmony with the evidence before our committee.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. That is why I so much regret we have not those hearings.

Mr. ASWELL. I am sorry for the gentleman's sake the hearings have not been printed.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I am presenting just what was presented by the department before my committee.

Mr. ADKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes.

Mr. ADKINS. Does not the gentleman know that down in our country where the gentleman used to live——

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes; we were neighbors.

Mr. ADKINS (continuing). Our people do not expect to participate in this appropriation. We have $200,000 available with the machinery all ready set up, so that when the corn borer comes over there we will be able to handle it. There was one little place in Kankakee County where they did handle it, and the reason there was no particular commercial damage done was because of the curtailing of this evil. We are perfectly willing, and our people are anxious, to have the Federal Government meet the situation in Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan, so that they can with a reasonable amount of good cultivation, keep the corn borer down below commercial damage. We appreciate the fact that where it has a big hold it is beyond what ought to be expected of the individual farmer to ask him to go out and put this additional work upon himself in order to keep down the pest. We are willing to pay for that extra work and that is all this appropriation is for. I know the trouble the department has in enforcing anything of this sort. We had the same difficulty in respect of the foot-and-mouth disease. The men do not like the idea of their coming in and handling the work and I can see how the department would be very glad to keep out of that feature of it; but if they will keep it down or get it in such condition that the farmers can control it under State control so that it will be handled without a big burden on the farmers, we are willing to take care of our situation unless they let it spread so that they come over in such great swarms it gets beyond our control, and if this does happen, $7,000,000 will look like a bagatelle in comparison with the damage that I know personally it does, because I inspected the fields in Massachusetts and New York in 1919 and know that they did have commercial damage there.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. The borer has been here for some years and all I know is the testimony given by the men in the department.

Mr. ADKINS. Did the other group of farmers who came down here advocating this measure come before the gentleman's committee?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. No; and the gentleman understands I am not quoting from them. I am simply undertaking to give the viewpoint of the Department of Agriculture in regard to this matter. There was something like $4,000,000 expended in repayments to the farmers themselves last year. Does the gentleman understand there is going to be nearly twice as big a clean-up this year and that they will need nearly twice as much money for that purpose?

Mr. ADKINS. Yes; the area is larger and they will have to cover more ground.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Then you are going to change the plan because the department had in mind looking after the border line when it appeared before my committee.

Mr. ADKINS. Yes; I understand very fully what the department has in mind because we had them before the committee for two days, and with the amount of machinery and set-up which they have they will have to use the same force for a short period of time in order to do the work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

The Clerk read the bill for amendment.

Mr. HOGG. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOGG: Page 2, line 14, after the word "control," insert "and provided, that no part of this amount shall be paid as wages to any inspector who is not a resident farmer of the county wherein he is employed and who shall have tilled and operated a farm for 10 years."

Mr. HOGG. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, the amendment which I have just introduced is one that deserves your careful consideration. From the argument you have just heard you have little or no idea of the disturbance which the administration of this law caused in Indiana and northern Ohio last year. The district which I represent is located in northeastern Indiana.

The inspectors are not the scientific men of the organization, but they are those who go about the farms and check the clean-up work done by the farmer. It is a matter of irritation to most farmers to have real young men tell them that their work has not been done satisfactorily.

My amendment provides that these inspectors shall be men residing in the county where their work is done, who shall have tilled and operated a farm for 10 years. In this way the farmers of the community will have a fair share in the administration of the law. As it is the farmers feel they are imposed upon by the Department of Agriculture, and I am here to tell you they have a right to have the conclusion they hold.

The administration of this law requires a sound discretion and mature judgment.

Mr. ASWELL. In that case the natives would have control—that is, the neighborhood would, would it not?

Mr. HOGG. They would not, because inspectors are subject to the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. ASWELL. These inspectors go around and determine whether the work is well done or not.

Mr. HOGG. It may be that way in your State.

Mr. ASWELL. We do not have corn borers in my State.

Mr. HOGG. In a county in my district a man offered a reward of $500 in cash if anyone would bring him a corn borer, and he still has his money.

Mr. PURNELL. The gentleman does not mean to say that he offered a reward for a corn borer to be brought from anywhere?

Mr. HOGG. No; in Whitney County.

Mr. PURNELL. That is a thinly infested area.

Mr. HOGG. It is in the blue area on the gentleman's map.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOGG. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman said a moment ago that young men compelled the farmer to go back and pick up cornstalks. Were those infested with the borer?

Mr. HOGG. Decidedly not. The department has since ruled that it will not insist on the same enforcement of the law that it did the last year, in that it does not think that such strict enforcement is at all necessary.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. But last year that was the rule when the young men were enforcing the regulations?

Mr. HOGG. Yes; but farmer inspectors would have used more deliberate judgment.

I am only pleading for moderation in enforcing the law, not that the farmers are not willing to obey instructions, but they want men of mature judgment for inspectors.

Mr. ADKINS. Will the gentleman yield there? Do you propose to go into the township where you are cleaning up and have the neighbors for inspectors?

Mr. HOGG. Certainly not. The need is that the inspectors shall be mature farmers.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOGG. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. From the testimony I heard I think this is a very important and necessary amendment. It is the best part of the law and I shall support it. I do believe that this law in the Corn Belt is about as popular as prohibition would be in John Philip Hill's district, if not more.

Mr. HOGG. Much of the money appropriated last year was wasted. Of the present amount, 90 per cent is certain to get to the farmer. I ask your support to qualify the inspectors as set out in the amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. ADKINS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have no doubt but that the law-enforcement officers encounter about the same sort of opposition that you encounter when you have any kind of trouble in the neighborhood of this kind.

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADKINS. Certainly.

Mr. BOX. Whether or not the Department of Agriculture recommends this measure of relief?

Mr. ADKINS. I do not understand that it does. The foot-and-mouth disease encountered the same thing in the community, where we had some level-headed fellows; we took the matter up in our own county, and that was the case. They came to my farm and we talked it over. There was not a dollar in sight. They said we do not know about this. I said, Now, look here, there is no nation that has ever cleaned up the foot-and-mouth disease. This Nation will clean it up; let them drive them into the pit and shoot them down, that I was sure that the Federal or State authorities are not going to permit any citizen to have his property destroyed for the good of all without reimbursing him.

In some communities where it was not talked over they had that sort of trouble. Inspectors came and they had the same trouble that you did in your community. In a matter of this kind you do have inspectors who do not know their job and go on a man's farm and get in trouble with him unnecessarily; I had charge of some, and they gave a lot of trouble sometimes. There is no doubt that last year mistakes were made. But you take men really interested and progressive, men that want to get rid of these things, let them come down and tell their story—I am sorry the hearings have not been published. I think it would be unfortunate to pass an amendment of this sort. I think the experience we had last year in cleaning this up demonstrates where the weaknesses are.

Mr. HOGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADKINS. Yes.

Mr. HOGG. Would the gentleman prefer to have a college inspector, a student 21 or 22 years old, or to have a native farmer?

Mr. ADKINS. That would depend upon the kind of farmer he was. The kind of farmer that I would want would be too busy to go off and fool around with a job of that kind.

Mr. HOGG. Is the gentleman speaking of farmers in Illinois?

Mr. ADKINS. Yes; and in any other locality. I have been over in the gentleman's State. I have farmed in Ohio. We have good farmers and poor farmers everywhere. I am not justifying the poor farmer any more than I am the poor business man. I know from personal experience as the head of a department in my State that where you tie a department up with a lot of details of this sort you just hinder their work. I find that the men in all of these departments are very reasonable.

Their whole thought is to try to do the work as satisfactorily as possible. I appreciate the position of my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOGG]. He has some fellows in his district who are very much wrought up about this. They do not appreciate the fact that the Government is coming in and paying for the work that they have to do, that they would not otherwise have to do, and put their crops out for the protection of the whole country. The people in Illinois are willing to do that. You have to take it for granted that the men in each administrative office of the Government have common sense. Here is a new thing. They had to go out in a hurry and clean up, and it is too much to expect of human nature not to find some who did not perform this perfectly.

Mr. HOGG. Is it good common sense to pay inspectors $2,000,000 to deal out $4,000,000 to farmers?

Mr. ADKINS. Does the gentleman know how many inspectors were required for this short time?

Mr. HOGG. I do not. I know that there were ten times the number there that were required.

Mr. ADKINS. They had to have enough to go over the ground. You might as well not spend any money as to not do it thoroughly.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman will remember that when we had the first corn borer bill up before the House we authorized an appropriation of $10,000,000.

Mr. ADKINS. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There was a great deal of anxiety at the time. We were told that they needed this money to eradicate the corn borer.

Mr. ADKINS. Oh, we can not eradicate it. We can cut it down so that it can be controlled so as not to cause any commercial damage.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Well, in any event we appropriated $10,000,000. Outside of obtaining a card index for each corn borer, did the department accomplish anything?

Mr. ADKINS. Oh, yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What?

Mr. ADKINS. Of course, they accomplished something. They reduced the ravages in most of the communities by reason of eradicating it to such an extent that it did not do any commercial damage. If you let a 10 per cent infection get in, you have a very severe damage to your crop. If you gentlemen had appropriated $2,000,000 in 1919, as we recommended you to do, and had taken the matter up where it originated, around Schenectady, N. Y., and around Boston, we would never have had to appropriate the $10,000,000, because we would have gotten it in such shape there that the farmers could have controlled it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Did it decrease the amount of the corn crop?

Mr. ADKINS. The borer will decrease it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Did it?

Mr. ADKINS. Yes; where it had been neglected.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And yet we still have a surplus?

Mr. ADKINS. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then it seems to me that nature wants to be kind to us in permitting us to have a surplus under the circumstances.

Mr. ADKINS. Does the gentleman not know that the surplus is the salvation of his people?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I understand that.

Mr. ADKINS. We hope that we will always have a surplus. I hope that this amendment will not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HOGG) there were—ayes 20, noes 38.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KETCHAM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12632, to provide for the eradication or control of the European corn borer, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAUGEN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BEAR RIVER MIGRATORY-BIRD REFUGE

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 3194, to establish the Bear River migratory-bird refuge.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa calls up the bill S. 3194, which bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 3194. The gentleman from Michigan, Mr. KETCHAM, will please take the chair.

Whereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. KETCHAM in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 3194, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3194) to establish the Bear River migratory-bird refuge.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. COLTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Utah is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, if I may have your attention for just a few moments I think I can make plain the purposes of this bill by reading a part of the letter of the Secretary of Agriculture in making his report upon the measure. He says:

> The Bear River marshes, extending about Bear River Bay, in Utah, comprise the greatest area of this character in the Rocky Mountain region and form the gathering place for millions of wild fowl, such as ducks and geese, during the north and south migrations. During each breeding season vast numbers of wild fowl rear their young in this area.
> Of recent years, owing to the scanty rainfall and the diversion of water for irrigation purposes from Bear River and other streams tributary to the marshes in that district, the shallow waters in many parts of these marshes during the summer and fall of each year become concentrated solutions of alkali. The myriads of ducks, geese, shore birds, and other species which frequent these waters are poisoned by the concentration of alkali and perish in enormous numbers. It is estimated that in the last few years not less than 7,000,000 ducks alone have thus perished in this area.

If there ever was a conservation measure for the preservation of wild life, I am sure that this is the one. As stated in the letter of the Secretary, this is a central location where these wild birds gather, particularly in the summer and fall. It is a great breeding place, and a great place for these birds to rest on their trips from the north to the south and from the south to the north. Whenever the rainfall is scanty or by reason of diversion of the water from the Bear River, large pools of strong alkaline water form, and these birds, having no other place to feed or nest, go into this impure water and immediately become sick and die. As stated by the Secretary of Agriculture, it is estimated that 7,000,000 of these birds have been destroyed in this way during the last few years.

This appropriation calls for $350,000, and not more than $50,000 is to be used in the purchase of land. The other $300,000 of it is to be used in diking the pure water at the mouth of the Bear River, which will furnish a secure refuge for the birds.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLTON. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. Will this be a protected reserve, so that no hunting will be allowed in it?

Mr. COLTON. No; not entirely. The action of the Senate left that matter in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture. The committee has amended so that at least 60 per cent shall be held at all times as an inviolate sanctuary. The reasons for that are twofold. The representatives of the department feel that they ought to have some little discretion, because of robber birds that might infest this section; and there might be a time when the food on the sanctuary would not be sufficient for the birds that come. But even as to the 40 per cent, the matter is left to the discretion of the Secretary. Then it would be unfair to the people not to permit hunting at any time.

Mr. NEWTON. But there is an absolute prohibition unless the Secretary makes the regulation?

Mr. COLTON. Yes; and he can not permit hunting at any time on more than 40 per cent of the sanctuary. Let me read a little further:

The Bureau of Biological Survey of this department has had numbered aluminum bands placed on more than 2,000 ducks in this area in order to determine the points to which they go when forced out of these marshes on the approach of winter. Large numbers of these banded birds have been taken in nine other surrounding Rocky Mountain and Pacific Coast States, particularly in the State of California, to which they go to winter in larger numbers than to any other State. It is thus conclusively shown by these banding operations that the Bear River marshes form a distributing center supplying migratory wild fowl to all the surrounding region.

The tremendous losses of these birds from alkaline poisoning have already alarmingly decreased the supply of migratory wild fowl in that entire region and threaten, if not remedied, to practically exterminate them, thus destroying a valuable food product and putting an end to wild-fowl hunting in all that region. The decrease of the birds has become so alarming within the past few years that there appears urgent need of the earliest possible action to end this drain on the valuable bird life of the West if it is to be saved.

In its treaty with Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds which live part of the year in the United States and part in Canada, the United States has assumed the responsibility of affording these birds reasonable protection while in this country. It appears, therefore, that to permit them to perish in untold numbers on these marshes without taking steps by the building of dikes and other methods to remedy the situation would be to neglect our plain duty and would directly affect the supply of birds in which Canada as well as the United States has a definite interest.

The building of the dikes and other improvements necessary to store waste fresh waters, now flowing into Salt Lake, for the purpose of flooding Bear River marshes would eliminate the death areas there, and afford a breeding ground for very great numbers of ducks and geese. Instead of a death trap the area would become a supply point for the surrounding region, producing vastly increased numbers of wild fowl on a great scale. The importance of diking has been shown on the Bear River Club grounds, where such dikes holding fresh water have resulted in greatly increased nesting and production of wild fowl.

The losses of ducks in this region through alkaline poisoning occur during the summer and fall. In order that the losses may be eliminated so far as possible during the coming season, work should be undertaken with the least possible delay.

During the past summer, with the cooperation of the Associated Sportsmen of California, an engineer of the Bureau of Public Roads made an engineering study of conditions at Bear River Bay, and his report shows that the project is entirely feasible. On the basis of the detailed information furnished in the report, actual construction work should be undertaken promptly.

The engineer's report indicates that $350,000 would cover the cost of the development of a great bird refuge in the Bear River Bay region. This would include the delta proper and provide for impounding fresh water over the broad marginal flats, relieving the conditions that have led to the death of millions of birds during past seasons through alkaline poisoning. The area which it is estimated can be included in this project at a cost of $350,000 is 44,400 acres.

The engineer's report directs attention to the possibility of including additional areas suitable for the development of a still greater refuge in this locality. In addition to the acreage already mentioned, he refers to an important adjacent area lying at a slightly higher elevation than the broad marginal flats of the more limited project, which, if included, would add 10,000 acres to the refuge at an approximate cost of $150,000. This cost would cover the construction of river-control works and other necessary improvements as well as the purchase of certain privately owned lands of great value as feeding and breeding grounds for waterfowl.

The detailed report of the engineer directs attention to the possibility of including still other suitable lands available for refuge purposes in the vicinity of Bear River Bay which, added to the above-mentioned projects, would embrace a total area of 82,900 acres, at a total estimated cost of $617,400.

There are some other interesting things disclosed in this report of the Secretary of Agriculture, but it is getting so late that I shall not detain the committee longer. With reference to the land, a subject which has been taken up somewhat and debated generally this afternoon while we were considering another bill, the Government owns practically all the area in the proposed refuge with the exception of about 12,000 acres. The State of Utah has already ceded to the Government its lands within the area. There are about 12,000 acres in the area that will belong, when the survey is completed, to a railroad company as part of its grant. We have their offer that they will sell this land for $1.25 an acre, and there will be no trouble in securing title to the land as we have the railroad offer to sell for $1.25 an acre. It is felt that $50,000 will be ample and perhaps more than will be necessary to procure title to all the land that will be inundated, and practically all of the money will be used for the purpose of providing fresh water and feeding places for these birds in this locality.

Now, Mr. Chairman, unless there is further question, I do not care to detain the committee longer.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. COLTON. Certainly.

Mr. KINCHELOE. As to the 60–40 per cent proposition, 60 per cent is to be preserved inviolate?

Mr. COLTON. Yes; inviolate.

Mr. KINCHELOE. This 60 per cent to be inviolate will be in the same territory, will it not?

Mr. COLTON. It may or may not be, as the Secretary may determine. It is the same amendment that I brought to the gentleman's office. My understanding is that he may change the area. I can assure the gentleman that I can see no objection to having it that way, because the food on 60 per cent might become scarce and it might be necessary to transfer the sanctuary to the other area, where the seed is more plentiful.

Mr. KINCHELOE. My idea is that if you leave it to the discretion of the Secretary to change the territory whenever he sees fit, then there will be nothing inviolate about it.

Mr. COLTON. Yes; there would be 60 per cent inviolate at all times. You see, those birds do not remain there during the entire year; they remain there only during the late summer and early fall of each year. I will say to the gentleman that this area covers such a wide strip of territory that even if there were shooting on one part of the refuge the birds would not be disturbed on the other part at all, because it covers such a large area of ground.

Mr. KINCHELOE. And the ratio would remain the same at all times?

Mr. COLTON. Absolutely. I am sure we will have one of the best bird refuges in the United States when the work contemplated is completed.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the committee amendment instead of the bill.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That no person shall take, injure, or disturb any bird, or nest or egg thereof, or injure or destroy any notice, signboard, fence, dike, ditch, dam, spillway, improvement, or other property of the United States on any area acquired or received under this act, or remove therefrom or cut, burn, injure, or destroy any grass or other natural growth thereon, or enter, use, or occupy the refuge for any purpose, except in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture: Provided, That at no time shall less than 60 per cent of the total acreage of the said refuge be maintained as an inviolate sanctuary for such migratory birds.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to section 5. At the end of section 5 I want to insert a proviso to the effect that no gunning or hunting shall be permitted under the provisions of this act unless, in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture, such permission to hunt or gun is necessary in order to protect the wild life for which this reservation is made a sanctuary.

Mr. COLTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. COLTON. That is the bill now.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. No; I do not think that is the bill.

Mr. COLTON. Yes. It is left to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture as to the 40 per cent and 60 per cent of this is inviolate as a sanctuary for all time.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will show me where in this bill there is any such provision as the gentleman suggests, I will withdraw my amendment, but there is nothing in this bill covering the point I wish to include in the bill.

Mr. COLTON. I think I can show it to the gentleman. That was gone over thoroughly in the committee and that is the provision of the bill, that it is left to the discretion of the Secretary as to the 40 per cent.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. But under what circumstances will he use his discretion? I want to provide that that discretion shall be exercised only when it is necessary for the preservation of animal or bird life.

Mr. JONES. That is the general policy of the department as to all of these sanctuaries.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. If that is the purpose of it, will the gentleman interpose no objection to my amendment? All I want to do is to protect the bird life in this refuge and make it a real sanctuary.

Mr. COLTON. I will say to the gentleman that adjoining parts of this land are now in the control of private clubs which are doing this very thing; that is, they are providing fresh water for the ducks, and on those preserves there is shooting. You can not prevent that, and this simply gives to the Secretary of Agriculture the right to say what part, if any, in his discretion, should ever be used for hunting purposes, and at no time shall it be more than 40 per cent.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. I believe the gentlemen and myself are in perfect accord as to the purpose sought to be accomplished. Will the gentleman permit an amendment in black and white providing that the Secretary of Agriculture shall use his discretion in permitting gunning only when that permission is necessary for the preservation of wild animal life?

Mr. COLTON. On page 9 the bill provides:

That no person shall take, injure—

And so on—

except in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture: Provided, That at no time shall less than 60 per cent of the total acreage of the said refuge be maintained as an inviolate sanctuary for such migratory birds.

Now, I hope the gentleman will not insist further on his amendment, because I feel absolutely sure, after having gone into it thoroughly in the committee, that this is the very best provision that could be included in the bill for the purpose.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. But there is no limitation upon the exercise of that discretion by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. COLTON. That is the policy of the department.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. But another Secretary can come in and change that policy overnight and we will have no protection. I am very much in favor of this bird preservation and I know others on this floor are, so I ask the gentleman if he will not accept that amendment.

Mr. COLTON. I would rather not change this language, because it has been carefully considered and worked out and I feel that just now, on the impulse of the moment, to accept an amendment that may tie the hands of the department would not be a good thing to do.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman I do not want to unnecessarily tie the hands of the department, but there will be other bills of this kind in the future and I feel that if the gentleman adopts a suggestion such as this it is going to make it easier for those of us who are in favor of the conservation of animal life to get those bills passed, and I would like the gentleman to accept the amendment.

Mr. CARSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. CARSS. Would not the language of the gentleman's amendment prevent all shooting on the reservation?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Yes; unless the Secretary of Agriculture considered it to be in the best interests of the preservation of animal life to permit in certain seasons such shooting where there is a scarcity of food, for instance.

Mr. CARSS. There are millions of ducks coming there during the year; suppose there was a shortage of food for them?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Then the Secretary could permit gunning.

Mr. CARSS. The Secretary would have to have inspectors go out there and make an examination, and then if he finds that the ducks are suffering from lack of food——

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Then he can permit gunning. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. CARSS. Then there would be no public shooting on the 40 per cent of the ground.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. No.

Mr. CARSS. But members of private clubs bordering on this land would have gunning, but the general public would not be allowed to hunt on the property.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Not on the public land. If they want to pay for a game preserve of their own, either through club membership or otherwise, that is a different proposition.

Mr. CARSS. Then how could a poor man do any hunting out there?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. We are not preserving gunning privileges, but establishing a refuge for these birds.

Mr. Chairman, I had not completed the drafting of my amendment and I will withdraw that and now simply offer an amendment amending section 5 by striking out the figures "60" in line 5, and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "80."

This is a compromise with the point of view of the gentleman from Utah and some others.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania: On page 9, line 5, strike out the figures "60" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "80."

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will not prevail. This matter has been carefully considered, and I think the amendment should not be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be available until expended, the sum of $350,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to effectuate the provisions of this act: Provided, That not to exceed $50,000 may be expended for the purchase of land, including improvements thereon.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON: On page 10, line 21, strike out "to be available until expended."

Mr. CRAMTON. I understand this is agreeable to the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. COLTON. My understanding is this simply requires the department to report back to Congress each year, and if it needs more money it may secure additional appropriation, so I have no objection.

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the committee amendment.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KETCHAM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (S. 3194) to establish the Bear River migratory-bird refuge, had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAUGEN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

OVERSEA HIGHWAY, MONROE COUNTY, FLA.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up House Resolution 117 relating to the oversea highway from Key West to the mainland of Florida.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to take up House Resolution 117, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 117

Whereas Monroe County, in the State of Florida, has bonded for large sums for the purpose of constructing an oversea highway from Key West to the mainland; and

Whereas the State of Florida, out of the road fund, has spent large sums of money assisting Monroe County in the construction of said road; and

Whereas Dade County has completed her part of the road, which is the main highway from Canada to Key West, known as United States Highway No. 1; and

Whereas this road is now completed except the construction of several bridges; and

Whereas this road when completed will be the national and the ninth wonder of the world, and as it will be of material benefit to the Government in case of war, the Government should construct these bridges, or at least assist in the construction of same: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the United States Bureau of Public Roads is hereby authorized and directed to make a survey with a view of obtaining the cost of the construction of said bridges and report the findings to the House of Representatives at the earliest possible moment.

With the following committee amendment:

After the word "bridges" in the fourth paragraph, strike out all down to the colon in the next paragraph.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Roads has authorized me to call this up. Monroe County has spent nearly $4,000,000 on this road. Dade County has spent nearly $400,000, and it is already completed except two very difficult bridges. This does not involve the Government at all.

Mr. CRAMTON. The way the resolution is presented it does involve the Government. There are whereases that commit the Federal Government as I understood the reading, declaring it is of great benefit to the Federal Government, and so forth.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. That was cut out by the committee and I am going to ask unanimous consent to substitute House Joint Resolution 256.

Mr. CRAMTON. What is the purpose of this?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. It is to have a survey and estimate of cost.

Mr. CRAMTON. Why should there be any difference in regard to this than under the general law of Federal highways?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. There is no objection to it.

Mr. CRAMTON. What is the purpose of the resolution?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. There is no intention to bind the Government; we have spent $5,000,000 of our own money.

Mr. CRAMTON. I think for the present I will object. I know the gentleman from Florida is very alert for his district——

Mr. SEARS of Florida. The Committee on Roads went into the matter thoroughly as the gentleman from Utah [Mr. COLTON], a member of the committee, will state.

Mr. CRAMTON. Is there a report from the Bureau of Roads?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. We had hearings, and the Bureau of Roads indorsed it.

Mr. CRAMTON. There is simply a statement here that it does not object.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Will this involve any cost to the Federal Government?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. It should not cost over several hundred dollars, and possibly not that.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the survey is made, the gentleman expects to press the Federal Government to pay a part of the cost of the bridges—more than they would under the Federal aid?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. I want to be perfectly frank with the gentleman; we would not press for more than is given to other bridges of like importance.

Mr. COLTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Yes.

Mr. COLTON. Is it not a fact that all the information is practically available for a survey, and it would be just a matter of the Federal employees examining the data that is already available?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. That is practically correct. My information is that it is nearly all available.

Mr. CRAMTON. Then it is expressly understood by the statement of the gentleman from Florida that the action of the House in passing this resolution does not in any way bind the Government to any expenditures on these bridges?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. In no way does it bind the Government to pay expenditures in building the bridges. Of course, at the next session I may introduce a bill, but this does not bind the Government in any way.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute House Joint Resolution 256, which will meet the objections of the gentleman from Michigan.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to substitute House Joint Resolution 256. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be read without the whereases.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the United States Bureau of Public Roads is hereby authorized and directed to make a survey with a view of obtaining the cost of the construction of said bridges and report the findings to the Congress at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the bridges be described in the resolution, the whereases having been stricken out.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. I think I can explain that. There are two main bridges over long stretches of the oversea highway which have not been built. The rest of the bridges have been built.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. But when you strike out the whereases and refer merely to "said bridges," you have no description of the bridges.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that the request of the gentleman was to read the resolution without the whereases.

Mr. CRAMTON. This comes up very suddenly. There has been no chance to see what is in those whereases. It is my understanding that they would be omitted. Of course, he will have to have such an amendment as that suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, did I understand the language of the resolution to be to obtain the cost?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the resolution.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the resolution.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then I move to strike out the word "obtaining" and insert in lieu thereof the word "ascertaining."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin moves to amend, on page 2, line 5, by striking out the word "obtaining" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "ascertaining."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Did the Chair understand that the gentleman from Florida wished to offer an amendment?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] says that he does not insist upon that amendment.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I have had opportunity to read the whereases. The only one I object to is the one that I understand is stricken out, at the top of page 2. To those on page 1, as follows, I have no objection:

Whereas Monroe County, in the State of Florida, has bonded for large sums for the purpose of constructing an oversea highway from Key West to the mainland; and

Whereas the State of Florida, out of the road fund, has spent large sums of money assisting Munroe County in the construction of said road; and

Whereas Dade County has completed her part of the road, which is the main highway from Canada to Key West, known as United States Highway No. 1; and

Whereas this road is now completed except the construction of several bridges: Therefore be it—

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the resolution as amended.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title of the joint resolution was amended.

House Resolution 117 was ordered to lie on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of absence indefinitely for my colleague Mr. FISHER, on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—SALARY OF JUDGE OF UNITED STATES COURT FOR CHINA (S. DOC. NO. 83)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered printed:

THE PROHIBITION QUESTION

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I should like to have inserted in the RECORD an Associated Press dispatch stating that on April 11 the national affairs committee of the National Republican Club of the city of New York adopted a resolution urging the repeal of the eighteenth amendment.

I simply desire to say in this connection, with due respect to the Republican Party, that it seems to have, in relation to the subject of prohibition, just a little of the uncertain character of Gideon's fleece as described in the Old Testament. It will be remembered that this fleece was of such a nature that it was dry when all around it was wet, and was wet when all around it was dry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the article will be printed in the RECORD.

The article is as follows:

[From the Washington Post, April 12, 1928]

WET VOTE BY NATIONAL REPUBLICAN CLUB ASKED—COMMITTEE VOTES RESOLUTION URGING REPEAL OF THE EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT—ADOPTION IS PREDICTED

NEW YORK, April 11.—The national affairs committee of the National Republican Club to-day adopted a resolution urging repeal of the eighteenth amendment. The action was taken in executive session and reported at the close of the meeting by former Representative Benjamin L. Fairchild, who presided as chairman of the committee.

The resolution will be presented to the full membership of the club next Tuesday. Mr. Fairchild predicted that it would be adopted by an overwhelming majority, adding that he expected it would be presented to the National Republican Convention by Nicholas Murray Butler.

Mr. Fairchild also is chairman of the subcommittee which drafted the resolution. Other members are W. M. K. Olcott, former district attorney; Martin Saxe, former United States Senator; and Charles P. Spooner, son of the late Senator Spooner, of Wisconsin. All these attended to-day's meeting.

Mr. Butler left before the vote was called, but Mr. Fairchild said he had voiced his intention to vote for the resolution had he remained. William Boardman, Elmer E. Cooley, Ralph Goddard, and Andrew R. Humphrey voiced opposition to the measure before the vote was taken, Fairchild said.

Other committee members who attended were Chauncey M. Depew, jr.; Philip Elting, collector of the port; Harte M. Juddson; Richard W. Lawrence, president elect of the club; William M. Calder, retiring president; and Col. Newbold Morris. A letter was received from T. Douglas Robinson, Assistant Secretary of the Navy, voicing his approval of the resolution.

The National Republican Club has about 2,000 members living in all parts of the country. President Coolidge is an honorary president, and among its members are three possible candidates for the Republican presidential nomination—Herbert Hoover, Vice President DAWES, and former Gov. Frank O. Lowden, of Illinois. About 1,000 members are residents of New York.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. FESS presented sundry petitions numerously signed by citizens of the State of Ohio, praying for the passage of legislation granting increased pensions to Civil War veterans and their widows, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana presented sundry petitions numerously signed by citizens of the State of Indiana, praying for the passage of legislation granting increased pensions to Civil War veterans and their widows, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COPELAND presented a petition of sundry citizens of New York City, N. Y., praying for the passage of legislation granting increased pensions to Civil War veterans and their widows, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

WORLD WAR VETERANS' RELIEF

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have received petitions in the form of a resolution adopted by all the various ex-service men's organizations in Arizona, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance:

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution

Whereas the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in the case of United States of America v. Sligh (filed March 5, 1928) has determined that a suit on any claim under a contract of yearly renewable term or converted insurance brought pursuant to section 19 of the World War veterans' act of 1924, as amended, becomes outlawed in accordance with the statutes of limitation in the State wherein said suit is instituted, if the claim, antecedent to suit, was not filed with the Veterans' Bureau within the period fixed by said State statute; and

Whereas it appears that the State statutes of limitations are not uniform in that in some States suits upon written contracts of insurance are barred within three years, whilst in other States, said actions may be maintained at any time within 6, 10, or 15 years; and

Whereas such condition is manifestly unjust in that the benefits of the war risk insurance act are unequally distributed in that the award depends upon the law of the State wherein the veteran resides; and

Whereas the valuable rights of hundreds of veterans will be prejudiced by such application of the varying State statutes of limitation; and

Whereas it is further apparent that the disabilities incurred upon which such suits are brought were received while serving a common cause, and in consequence thereof the treatment accorded to those claimants should of a certainty be uniform and just; and

Whereas in the process of rehabilitation of disabled veterans many are not aware of their true condition—that is to say, of the permanency of their total disability until after years of treatment—and until most State statutes of limitations of four and six years would bar such claims it is eminently reasonable and just to allow a 10-year period for the determination of permanency of their total disability; and

Whereas dating such 10-year period from July 2, 1921, would be dating same from the day the Great War was officially ended: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That Congress of the United States of America be, and it hereby is, petitioned to amend section 19 of the World War veterans' act (June 7, 1924, ch. 320, sec. 19, 43 Stat. 612, amended March 4, 1925, ch. 553, sec. 2, 43 Stat. 1302) by adding to such section the following:

"Provided further, That no State or Federal statutes of limitation shall be deemed to apply to any suit filed under this section on or before July 2, 1931;

"Provided further, That after July 2, 1931, all suits under this act must be filed within six years from the accrual of the cause of action;

"Provided further, That this section, as amended, shall be deemed to be in effect as of October 6, 1917"; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to every Member of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America.

On request of Mr. ASHURST, the following letter was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

TUCSON, ARIZ., April 2, 1928.

HON. HENRY F. ASHURST,
Senator from Arizona, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: There is a great deal of interest shown among the veterans of this State in bill (H. R. 97) introduced by Representative LAGUARDIA, of New York, which would permit any former service man having an active tubercular disease and entitled to hospitalization under the World War veterans' act, 1924, either hospitalization or a maintenance allowance of $4.75 per day.

Concerning the merits of this bill permit me to call your attention to an experiment carried on in this State which has made it possible for a number of disabled men suffering from tuberculosis to stay out of the hospital with every indication of great benefit to themselves while working short hours, or as the spirit and their strength moved them, and showing a renewed interest in life, as well as a complete change in their mental attitude as compared to that displayed under institutional supervision.

I refer to the Arizona Hut, at Tucson, established and financed by Mrs. John C. Greenway, of Ajo and Tucson, the widow of the late Gen. John C. Greenway, Arizona's soldier, builder, and benefactor.

Inspired by her late husband to do something for the great number of disabled ex-service men pouring into Arizona seeking its sunshine and climate, and usually arriving broken in both health and pocketbook, Mrs. Greenway cast about for some means of helping these men to help themselves. On her visits to the two veterans' hospitals in the State she noticed that though some of the men were doing work at intervals, in leather, woodwork, and the like, under the direction of the occupational therapy department, the work done was not in many cases salable on its merits. Noticing how this work seemed to take the men's minds from their physical condition she began to wonder if this was not the solution of curing these men of their great affliction and mental depression. On the theory that given an opportunity to work short hours, when they felt like it, and under the direction of teachers who could direct their efforts toward salable articles, that the public would gladly purchase, Mrs. Greenway took her ideas to the annual spring conference of the American Legion held at Phoenix in January of 1927, and after a discussion of this all-important question of the welfare of the tubercular ex-service men in this State and in the veterans' hospitals located at Tucson and Prescott, the Arizona Hut idea was born.

Mrs. Greenway made a careful study of the situation following this meeting and traveled extensively, gathering ideas on how to run such an institution as she had in mind, so that it would best serve the disabled and ill ex-service men and women of Tucson and vicinity and assist them to regain their health and peace of mind at the same time that they were accumulating a little earnings, so much needed by them.

A workshop was opened in Tucson on April 14, 1927, with articles on display, most of which had been made by patients at the veterans' hospital at Pastime Park at the suggestion of Mrs. Greenway.

Cactus canes, toys, and trinkets from models furnished from eastern markets by Mrs. Greenway were the first things attempted, with the now famous cactus cane taking the lead in popularity. As machinery arrived for the hut and was installed by Mrs. Greenway, who has financed the entire project, sewing and carpenter work were started, and later leather work, copper work, and furniture manufacturing.

Gradually the hut work has turned into cabinetwork and the making of furniture, and this work now offers a splendid opportunity for the institution to get into large production, enter the local market for house furnishing, and thus afford more work for additional men and their families, who are also permitted to work at the hut.

No greater service was ever offered the disabled ex-service men and their families than this great work of Mrs. Greenway, and on the eve of its first anniversary Mrs. Greenway reports that the hut has not only found remarkable talent in these men and women, who before the advent of the hut were unable to put them to use, but that it has stimulated astounding amount of loyalty, sincerity, and determination on the part of those who have connected themselves with the work of the hut.

Sick men who before entering into this work were dissatisfied, unhappy, and sweating under the supervision and monotony of institutional life, or the prospects of it, have completely changed after a few months at the hut, and this has not only been noticed by Mrs. Greenway but by men of the medical profession who are on the advisory board of this hut.

A great deal of money has been invested in this idea, and a great deal of the time and energy of this friend of the ex-service men and women of this State as well. The end of the first year shows a financial loss to its sponsor, yet she feels, as do her close advisors, that the good that has been accomplished and the evident success of such an idea as a means of rehabilitating these sick men, and keeping those who are able out of the hospital, far exceeds in importance the amount of money lost during the first year of its existence.

The hut expended in 1927, $28,000, of which $13,893 went for material and equipment, $10,744 paid out for salaries to the disabled men working in or for the hut, and $3,338 spent for actual purchases of material made by disabled men and women. The hut had a $6,000 loss for the year 1927 and had on December 31, 1927, assets of approximately $10,000.

Amongst many others the following citizens of Tucson are serving as an advisory board in an effort to assist Mrs. Greenway in making this venture the success that it justly deserves. This committee was appointed a year ago by Col. A. J. Dougherty, now past commander of the American Legion, Department of Arizona; Dr. I. E. Huffman; Mr. Mathews; Mr. Mose Drachman; Mr. Condron; Mr. Fred Brown; Mr. John Rapp; Judge Sawtelle; Mrs. W. H. Lewellyn; Mr. Mike Noonan; Mr. Forrest Doucette; Dr. W. D. McFaul, commanding officer of the United States veterans' hospital, Tucson; Mr. O. T. Koch; Mrs. Carl Pastor; Mrs. Merton Martenson; Dr. S. H. Eckles; Mr. F. R. Griffith; State Senator Claude Smith; Mrs. C. A. Belin; and many others.

Sincerely yours,
F. E. DOUCETTE,
Associate Editor Southwest Veteran,
Director American Legion News Service, Tucson, Ariz.

EMPLOYMENT ON FEDERAL WORKS

On request of Mr. ASHURST, the following letter was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, STATEHOUSE,
Phoenix, Ariz., April 2, 1928.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have been interested in reading newspaper comment on House bill 11141, introduced by Congressman ROBERT L. BACON, of New York. According to the newspaper accounts, the bill provides that contractors on Federal work shall give preference to local labor when feasible to do so.

It is reported that preference will be given to employment, "first, to citizens of the United States and of the State, Territory, or District in which the work is being performed who have been honorably discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and who are available or qualified to perform the work to which the employment relates; second, to citizens of the United States who are bona fide residents of the State, Territory, or District in which the work is being performed, and who are available and qualified to perform the work to which the employment relates; third, to citizens of the United States; fourth, to aliens."

The measure is a great improvement and highly desirable.

However, in order to be entirely satisfactory, I believe the fourth qualification permitting the employment of aliens on Government works should be dropped.

I believe you will agree with me that there should be a positive prohibition of the employment of aliens on any public works. I do not believe that it can be successfully contended that there are not sufficient citizens of required efficiency and training to perform our public work.

You are, of course, familiar with our statutes in Arizona which prohibit the employment of aliens on any work of the State or its subdivisions. Our State statute, however, permits the employment on public works of persons who have declared their intention to become citizens. We find that this provision is being widely abused by contractors who herd droves of Mexicans, usually, into the offices of the county recorders and have them file declarations of intention to become United States citizens. In practically all cases there is no intention or desire on the part of these declarants to become citizens of this country, and no further steps are ever taken toward becoming citizens. The procedure is merely subterfuge to conform to the letter of the law. It is resorted to by contractors in order to permit them to employ alien labor at rates of pay below those acceptable to citizen workmen. Thus the intent and purpose of the State law is to a large degree defeated.

I am for a straight-out enactment of a State law limiting employment on public works to citizens. I think the same should apply to Federal works. I believe that when Congress is enacting legislation on this subject the measure should be drafted so as to limit employment to citizens.

I find that the present situation with reference to Federal employment which allows contractors to hire alien laborers has caused great and frequent bitterness toward Federal departments on the part of citizen workmen in my State. We have had unemployment in Arizona in the last two years as has occurred over the country. Instances where contractors on forest highways, particularly in this State, have denied work to jobless citizens while giving employment to aliens, have caused a very unhealthy feeling among our citizens, and in one instance a near riot between races resulted.

I respectfully submit these thoughts to you for consideration in connection with the Bacon bill now pending before Congress.

With highest personal esteem, I am,

Very sincerely yours,

GEO. W. P. HUNT, Governor.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

ANDREW W. MELLON, SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, on March 22, this year, in a discussion on Senate Resolution 173, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] made a statement which appears on page 5151 of the RECORD, in which he made the charge that the introduction of this resolution was the result of a private feud between the Senator from Michigan and the Secretary of the Treasury. He said the statement I had just made in the Senate with reference to the resolution was vicious, malicious, and, he believed, untrue in most instances.

In view of these charges made by the Senator from New Hampshire, it seems incumbent upon me to make a reply to such allegations and in doing so to set forth all the facts in chronological order.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an interruption at that point?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MOSES. The recital which the Senator from Michigan has made of my words is correct. I realize that their nature, their implication, and their general character infringe Rule XIX of the Senate. There is no Senator more than I who, because of my being frequently called upon to administer the rules, should be more scrupulous in observing them. In this instance I find myself clearly in the wrong. I deeply regret it. I offer my regrets to the Senate and to the Senator whose susceptibilities I have unintentionally wounded. I ask, so far as the RECORD will permit, that the words which are the cause of my offending may be withdrawn.

Mr. President, there has never been a time in my life when I have hesitated to make instant and complete reparation for any wrong which I have committed. That time has certainly not come in this episode. I had no intention of imputing an improper or an unworthy motive to the Senator who has been, I recognize, wholly within his rights; and in order that I may be inclusive in what I have to say, I want to add that in recognizing this I recognize, as with all other Senators, the Senator's sincerity, tenacity of purpose, and courage with which he follows his convictions.

Mr. COUZENS. I desire to thank the Senator, and in continuing my recitation of the history of this matter I shall eliminate any further reference to the Senator's remarks. The only further interest I have is to demonstrate, if possible, that this is not a feud.

Before starting in on the discussion, however, I desire to say that I shall not be intimidated by any statement that the Senator from New Hampshire may make or by any condemnation or ridicule by any part of the press of the country. I am unafraid to approach my duties as a public officer because of any fear of condemnation or ridicule.

This fight may be called a feud by anyone who so desires, but I wish to assure the Senate and the public that it is not a feud. It is rather a protest against a system of government administered under the domination of men of great wealth, a system that has been in force a number of years. It involves the widespread power of wealth in the hands of persons who use it improperly. The ramifications of this power are much more far-reaching than simply the administration of the Treasury Department. It involves the freedom of Members of Congress, as I will hereinafter show. It involves the freedom of the press, as the records of the Treasury will show. It involves the whole people, not alone the people who pay taxes.

I shall, as briefly as possible, endeavor to give in chronological order the history of this controversy from the beginning.

On November 10, 1923, for consideration of the Sixty-eighth Congress, first session, the Secretary of the Treasury presented his program for tax reduction. On December 20, 1923, I wrote Mr. Mellon asking certain questions as to his reasons for his recommendations—a copy of my letter appears on page 915 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 14, 1924.

On January 2, 1924, the Secretary replied, and in the concluding sentence of his letter he said:

> Common experience and all statistics available point to the same end. What is the remedy? Let us have diagnosis and cure—not autopsy and verdict.

The complete letter appears on page 916 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 14, 1924.

The Secretary, evidently believing that he had made a most convincing argument in his letter of January 2, called me on the telephone and said he had another inquiry along the same lines as that of mine and wanted to know if he might use his letter to me of January 2, 1924, to which I replied he had my permission to use it as he pleased.

The letters were then given to the public by the Secretary, and, I think, all subsequent correspondence. If there was a desire for a feud then it was first indicated by his request because I had not considered our correspondence as public.

From that time on there were several exchanges of letters continuing over quite some time. The correspondence in part will be found on pages 917 and 918 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 14, 1924, and on pages 1205, 1206, and 1207 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 21, 1924, Sixty-eighth Congress, first session. These were all put in the RECORD by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

Three letters, one dated January 24, 1924, written to me by the Secretary, to which I replied on February 6, and the letter from the Secretary ending the correspondence on February 15, 1925, have not been placed in the RECORD, so far as I know.

The result of this correspondence being published was that many letters came to my office criticizing the conduct of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. From 8 to 10 employees and ex-employees of the bureau came to see me to state their complaints and to point out the conditions of the bureau.

Between December 21, 1923, and January 10, 1924, the New York World published a series of stories criticizing the Bureau of Internal Revenue for its manner of handling tax cases.

The National Industrial Conference Board, representing large manufacturers, criticized the bureau in a statement, which, in part, is as follows—the statement, by the way, was published before this controversy started—

> Dissatisfaction with our present administration of the income tax is heard on all sides and complaints are not without justification. Cases of arbitrary and unreasonable assessments are by no means rare, a situation often due to immature judgment or lack of adequate knowledge on the part of the Government official or agent. Business firms are sometimes confronted with assessments that are many times the tax as finally determined, but the final determination of the tax often takes years, and in the meantime the threatened tax makes impossible business extensions and improvements which are necessary or desirable.

In addition to this, Mr. Mellon had suggested that "Let us have diagnosis and cure—not autopsy and verdict"; so I accepted this suggestion, and on February 21, 1924, I introduced Senate Resolution 168, as follows:

> Whereas the Bureau of Internal Revenue of the Treasury Department has not, according to reports, completed settlement of all tax cases for the year 1917, which cases should have been settled long ago, and—

And, by the way, later reports indicate that many of them are not as yet settled.

> Whereas this delay is indication of improper organization or gross inefficiency, or the bureau's handicap by conditions of which the Senate is not aware, and

Whereas as the result of this system and this delay the Government has, it is claimed, lost millions of dollars, taxpayers have been and still are oppressed, and corruption or the opportunity for corruption exists; and

Whereas rates for income tax are governed entirely by the administration or lack of it; and

Whereas there can be no helpful, honest, sincere, and intelligent action on the rates of taxation until this system is corrected: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the President pro tempore of the Senate is authorized to appoint a special committee of five Members, three of whom shall be of the majority party and two of the minority party, which shall investigate the Bureau of Internal Revenue to ascertain the extent to which said conditions exist and report thereon not later than April 1, 1924, so that this information may be ready for the Senate in considering a tax revision and tax reduction bill now before the House of Representatives.

The committee is authorized to hold hearings, to sit during the sessions and recesses of the Sixty-eighth Congress, and to employ such stenographic and other assistants as it may deem advisable. The committee is further authorized to send for persons and papers; to require by subpœna the attendance of witnesses, the production of books, papers, and documents; to administer oaths; and to take testimony. Subpœnas for witnesses shall be issued under the signature of the chairman of the committee. The cost of stenographic service to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

On March 5, 1924, the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate reported the resolution. On March 7, 1924, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance, and on March 10, 1924, the Committee on Finance reported the resolution back to the Senate. On March 12, 1924—page 4023 of the RECORD—the resolution was adopted without a record vote after all the preamble and provision for the employment of experts had been stricken out. The senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] was occupying the chair, and he appointed Senators WATSON, Ernst, Jones of New Mexico, KING, and COUZENS, with Senator WATSON as chairman. On March 14, 1924, the committee held its first meeting.

The resolution shows that we had no authority to employ experts, lawyers, accountants, or engineers. We attempted to get along without the employment of such experts but it seemed impossible, so finally Senator Jones of New Mexico, recognizing the situation, suggested that we should arrange for the appointment of counsel. On April 9, 1924, I offered a resolution in the committee—page 505 of the committee hearings—providing that Francis J. Heney, of California, be appointed counsel for the committee.

The committee approved the resolution by a vote of 3 to 2, with Senators WATSON and Ernst dissenting. As the committee was without funds and I had had difficulty in getting the resolution out of the Committee on Finance, I proposed to pay the expense of counsel. It afterwards developed that to have done this might have been against the law. Although four members of our committee were lawyers, none of them suggested to me that it would be illegal, the statute prohibiting it had evidently slipped their minds, and I, of course, knew nothing about it.

However, on page 511 of the committee record Senator KING said:

> I would prefer that a provision be inserted that his activities—
>
> Mr. Heney's—
> in connection with preparing the case, that his work should be done under the direction of the committee.

To this we all agreed as will appear by the colloquy that took place on pages 513 to 516 of the committee record. The resolution authorizing the appointment of counsel was thus approved, April 9, 1924.

Just prior to this action to authorize the employment of counsel, namely on March 24, 1924 (page 200 of the record of committee hearings), I asked Mr. Hartson, solicitor of the bureau, if he could give us any information within the rules, concerning the Standard Steel Car Co. case. Mr. Hartson replied that all of the cases in connection with which the Secretary's name had been mentioned would be submitted very gladly to the committee. He further stated that he was quite certain that this was going to be done in the case of all of the Secretary's companies.

On March 25, 1924, page 223 of the record of hearings of the committee, Deputy Commissioner Nash said to the committee that he had a statement from the Secretary of the Treasury to present to the chairman of the committee, Senator WATSON. The letter read:

In the hearing before your committee yesterday, what purported to be a copy of a memorandum delivered by an ex-employee to a member of your committee was introduced and has been made the basis of headlines in the newspapers which might lead the public to believe I had sought to influence the Bureau of Internal Revenue in its consideration of the tax liability of certain companies in which I am interested as a stockholder. As I have already stated, I have never interfered in any way with the Bureau of Internal Revenue in any tax matter, least of all would I do so in cases in which it might be charged that I was personally concerned. I feel, however, that it is due to me and to the companies involved that your committee make an immediate investigation in order that you may thoroughly satisfy yourself and the public whether or not these companies have received any favors from the Government.

Three companies which have been mentioned are the Gulf Refining Co. and its subsidiaries, the Standard Steel Car Co. and the Aluminum Co. of America. Each of these companies has advised the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that it waives its right to privacy under the statute and the Commissioner is authorized to produce to your committee without restriction of any kind all of the tax returns and accompanying papers for each tax year. Messrs. Ernst & Ernst, certified public accountants, are familiar with the tax adjustments of these companies, since they handled their presentation before the bureau. They can, undoubtedly, be of assistance to your committee in explaining the complicated questions involved, and I am informed are ready to respond to any call of your committee. Mr. A. C. Ernst will be in Washington on the 26th and will be available then or thereafter. If question is later raised with respect to any other companies in which I may be interested, I shall be glad to do what I can to obtain similar publicity to their returns.

(Signed) A. W. MELLON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

I draw this to the attention of the Senate to emphasize that the inquiry into Mr. Mellon's companies was made at his request and not at my request, as claimed by former Senator Ernst and some of the press.

On April 10, 1924, I became ill and was afterwards sent to Johns Hopkins Hospital for an operation and was unable to return to the Senate until June 6, 1924, and on June 7, 1924, the Senate adjourned.

While I was absent, on April 10, 1924, the President sent to the Senate a message and inclosed a letter addressed to him by Mr. Mellon. They are printed on page 6087 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date.

The President's message said in part:

> It seemed that the request for a list of the companies in which the Secretary of the Treasury was alleged to be interested, for the purpose of investigating their tax returns, must have been dictated by some other motive than a desire to secure information for the purpose of legislation.

As I have just pointed out, the Secretary had requested that very thing himself. The President evidently had not been informed by Mr. Mellon that he himself had asked to have the tax returns of the companies in which he was interested investigated. I quote from a part of the Secretary's letter:

> From the line of investigation selected by Senator COUZENS and by the atmosphere which he has seen fit to inject into the inquiry it is now obvious that his sole purpose is to vent some personal grievance against me.

At that time I had no personal grievance.

> All companies in which I have been interested have been sought out. This investigation has disclosed that no company in which I may have been interested has received any different or better treatment than any other taxpayer. Any constructive purpose of the committee has now been abandoned.
> At a meeting of the committee yesterday Senator COUZENS carried a resolution against the objection of the two Republican members, empowering Francis J. Heney to assume charge of the investigation and to conduct the examination of witnesses, with the understanding expressly stated in the resolution that neither the committee nor the Government pay Heney's compensation. In effect, a private individual is authorized to investigate generally an executive department of the Government. This individual is paid by, not the Senate or its committee, but Senator COUZENS alone.

It will be noticed here that 17 days after Secretary Mellon had declared, as due him and his companies, that they be investigated, that he complains that all the companies in which he had been interested had been sought out for investigation. In addition to this, I desire to point out that Mr. Mellon further stated the investigation had disclosed that no company in which he may have been interested had received any different or better treatment than any other taxpayer, and yet only 17 days had elapsed from the time he asked us to make this investigation until the time he complains we were selecting his companies.

Incidentally, at that point I may state that we had nobody to examine the returns. We did hold hearings in which we heard complaints; but we had no experts to investigate the files that had been furnished the committee by the Secretary.

The facts are apparent. It will be seen that we had no one to make the investigation. It was therefore obvious that the Secretary was saying something that was untrue when he said:

> This investigation has disclosed that no company in which I may have been interested has received any different or better treatment than any other company.

Mr. Mellon was at that time protesting against our employing some one to make the investigation. I desire to emphasize here that the resolution adopted by the committee clearly stated that Mr. Heney's activities were to be under the complete control of the committee and that nothing could be done by him without first getting instructions and directions by the committee in executive session.

Mr. Mellon further advised the President—

> Government business can not continue to be conducted with frequent interference by investigations of Congress, entirely destructive in their character. Government by investigation is not government.

This will appear very strange reading, in view of what the investigations of the Senate have disclosed in the matter of oil leases, the conduct of the Department of Justice under Attorney General Daugherty, and the conduct of the Veterans' Bureau under Mr. Forbes, and the conduct of former and present Cabinet officers in the handling of the deficiency in the Republican campaign fund of 1920.

Strange that Government by investigation is not government in view of all these disclosures. The disclosures of the committee investigating the Bureau of Internal Revenue will not be dealt with here, because I am simply replying to Senator MOSES's charges that this is a feud.

On the same day that the President's message was received by the Senate, Senator WATSON, of Indiana, introduced Senate Resolution 210, which called for the discharge of the Select Committee of the Senate to Investigate the Bureau of Internal Revenue. On April 11, 1924, Senator Jones of New Mexico, introduced Senate Resolution 211, which provided for the continuation of the committee work and the appointment of experts, counsel, engineers, and so forth. From then on, intermittently, there was discussion concerning these resolutions until May 6, 1924, when the Senate, without a record vote, adopted Senator Jones's Resolution 211, and then, without a record vote, laid Senator WATSON's resolution on the table.

While I was in the hospital at this time and could not participate, the RECORD evidences an overwhelming conviction that the investigation should continue. However, Chairman WATSON held no meeting and Congress adjourned June 7, 1924.

On July 22, 1924, Senator WATSON called me by phone at Detroit and said he wanted a meeting of the committee to investigate the Bureau of Internal Revenue. We agreed over the telephone to hold a meeting on July 25, and I came to Washington for that purpose.

At this meeting Senator WATSON resigned as chairman and I was selected by the committee in his place. Senator Jones and I were named as a committee to employ experts and assistants. From then on an organization was completed, and work continued with numerous hearings until January 3, 1925, when the committee began transmitting to the Senate reports of evidence taken in executive sessions signed unanimously by the committee. These reports were filed in installments because of the volume of evidence. The reports were not printed in the RECORD, but were filed in the office of the Secretary of the Senate.

On March 7, 1925, the New York World published a first-page account of some of this testimony under the heading:

> Thompson saved huge income tax, record reveals.

This date is important. I hope Senators who are listening will remember that that was March 7, 1925. The reference was to the case of William Boyce Thompson, chairman of the ways and means committee of the Republican National Committee, and the man referred to by Mr. Mellon before the Public Lands Committee recently as being active with Will Hays in raising the Republican campaign fund of 1920.

Remember that this was on March 7, 1925, early in the morning that the New York World came out with this story, because on the same afternoon, or about eight hours thereafter, Commissioner David H. Blair and his assistant, Deputy Commissioner C. R. Nash, appeared at the door of the Senate, invited me outside, and told me they wanted to present me with some papers they had. I took the commissioner and his assistant, Mr. Nash, into the Vice President's office, which was not occupied, and then Commissioner Blair handed me the following letter:

> MY DEAR SENATOR: I inclose herewith a copy of a memorandum which has been received in the Treasury Department in connection with your 1919 income taxes. An examination of your return for that year shows that the figures mentioned in the memorandum as of March 1, 1913, market value of the stock for taxation purposes, approximate the value upon which the tax was originally assessed, but there appears nothing in the files of the bureau to sustain the correctness of this value. The memorandum, on the other hand, makes out a prima facie case of too low a March 1, 1913, value.
> Being put upon notice, the bureau necessarily must take action to establish the correct value. The bureau records show that your return for 1919 was filed on March 13, 1920. The statute of limitations will, therefore, run on March 13, 1925, less than a week from to-day. In order that the bureau may have time to investigate the information contained in the memorandum and that you may have an opportunity to present to the bureau evidence tending to justify the figure estimated for the March 1, 1913, value, it is suggested that you sign and return to me the inclosed waiver, upon receipt of which you will be given ample opportunity to present your case to the bureau.
> In the event, however, that the bureau does not receive the waiver promptly, in order to protect the United States, it will be necessary to assess against you an additional tax based upon the information now available to the bureau.
>
> Under the practice in force hearing to review such an assessment may be had in the solicitor's office, and in the event the assessment is there confirmed you will, of course, have your appeal to the Board of Tax Appeals.
>
> Yours very truly,
> D. H. BLAIR, Commissioner.

With the letter he handed me a memorandum which charged that a valuation made by the bureau in 1919 of the Ford Motor Co. stock, as of March 1, 1913, was in error and that I owed the Government additional taxes of between ten million and eleven million dollars.

Mr. Blair would not tell me who the author of the memorandum was.

This seemed a very strange procedure in view of the fact that all communications on other tax matters had been mailed to my legal residence in Michigan.

I thought that if I should sign the waiver while investigating the Bureau of Internal Revenue that my waiver might be considered as a club to halt the work that I was trying to do, so I promptly declined to sign it.

On March 13, or thereabouts, information came to me that seemed reliable that the Treasury Department had a like memorandum submitted to it early in 1922. I had no way of verifying this. However, on March 13, I drew the Senate's attention to this fact, record of which will appear on page 193 of the RECORD. I did this because the 1922 memorandum, it will be observed, was filed with the bureau at the time there was a political fight being made against the seating of Senator Truman H. Newberry.

Mr. Mellon evidently was in New York, because on March 14 former Senator Ernst, of Kentucky, received the following telegram from Mr. Mellon:

> I understand that you wish to learn from me when first there was brought to my attention the question of an additional tax being due from Senator COUZENS on his 1919 taxes. While Finance Committee was considering extension of life of Couzens committee in February, this year, the person who later furnished the memorandum which Mr. Blair sent Senator COUZENS called on me and stated that the minority stockholders, including Senator COUZENS, who sold out to Mr. Ford in 1919, owed large additional taxes. The information was entirely new to me. I was unwilling to raise the question then, because I would be charged with attempting to intimidate Senator COUZENS in his effort to have his committee extended. On March 6 of this year I received a memorandum giving detailed information with respect to the valuation of the Ford stock, a copy of which was delivered to Senator COUZENS the next day by Mr. Blair.

I draw your attention that Mr. Mellon had information concerning this alleged condition in February, but he says he would not act upon it because the life of the Couzens committee was in the balance and he might be charged with attempting to intimidate me in my effort to have the committee extended. However, he had no hesitancy in proceeding after the authority of the committee had been extended and we had real power to continue the investigation.

For reference, I desire to point out that on February 9, 1925, I introduced Senate Resolution 333, to extend the life of the Select Committee of the Senate Investigating the Bureau of Internal Revenue. The resolution was adopted February 26, 1925. This point I desire to bring out—that even then no assessment was made against me until the day that some of the evidence commenced to appear in the public press.

During the speech of the former Senator from Kentucky, Mr. Ernst, and after he had read the telegram from Mr. Mellon, the Senator from Virginia took the floor and told how the valuation of 1919 was made by the best men in the bureau, and said that the Senator from Kentucky had emphasized the suggestion that this memorandum was "newly discovered evidence"—so "newly discovered evidence that the Treasury Department had but a few days to avert the disadvantage of the statute of limitations." The Senator from Virginia asked anyone to point out one statement from the Secretary of the Treasury wherein the Secretary contended this memorandum was "newly discovered evidence."

The assessment was formally made before the running of the statute of limitations, as a so-called jeopardy assessment. The amount involved some $30,000,000 additional assessment against my former associates and myself.

After the assessment was made, all but one of the taxpayers put up bonds and appealed to the Board of Tax Appeals. The first hearings before the Board of Tax Appeals took place in Detroit in January, 1927. On January 17, 1927, one of the attorneys for the taxpayers addressed the board as follows:

Mr. DAVIES. In connection with this 1922 memorandum we would like to ask the Government whether there are any memoranda or documents pertaining thereto in the files of the Treasury Department, disclosing when, if at any time, it was considered, and by whom. And if he is unable to give us that, we would then request that he give us the name of the official who could answer certain inquiries with reference to the course of this memoranda and what happened to it in the Treasury Department, under oath, subject to subpœna.

To this request the counsel for the bureau made objections. To these objections Mr. John W. Davis, counsel for the taxpayers, said:

May I say one word? Quite regardless of the question of procedure, whether this evidence is to be procured by subpœna duces tecum, or by successive subpœnas to every officer of the bureau who might by any possibility have cognizance of these facts—which, of course, would be within our rights—or whether it is to be produced as a result of a voluntary tender on the part of the Government is, in the last analysis, a matter of convenience as between counsel, the board, and the Government. But it seems to me, on the question of right, there is something very deep in connection with this particular demand.

This suit is something more than a mere contest between private litigants, each one striving for an advantage, each one desirous to give to his adversary so much information and no more, and as he may be compelled to furnish by the rules of law.

This suit is a contest between the Government and the citizens, and I maintain it to be a fundamental right of a citizen when confronted by his Government to know everything that the Government or any one of its officers has done that affects in the most remote fashion the right that he asserts.

There are no secrets between the Government of the United States and the citizens who support it, and there should be none. There is no bureau in Washington that should not be open from top to bottom to any citizen of the United States in any matter that concerns the slightest of his rights.

This is not a contest for final victory between these parties. Mr. Fred Lehman, of St. Louis, when he was Solicitor General of the United States, gave voice to an epigram that I have always believed ought to be framed and hung on the walls of every legal representative of the United States, or, indeed, of any representatives of the United States who is charged with the solution of a controversy with any citizen; and that epigram was this: "That whenever the case is decided right, the Government wins." And so it does; because the major purpose of any Government is to do justice between the citizen and the power that he supports and to whom he owes allegiance. So, I insist that, as a matter of substantive right here, whatever the machinery may be by which we reach it—and that is a matter purely of convenience—but as to substantive right, there is no demand that we can make on the Bureau of Internal Revenue that it is not its duty to comply with.

I think that statement is so clear and so important in all the affairs of our Government that I wanted to have it placed forever in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The Board of Tax Appeals did not rule on the demand for this file of 1922 which it was charged the bureau had.

In the afternoon of the same day and after the noon recess Mr. Gregg, counsel for the bureau, returned to the Board of Tax Appeals, and for the first time admitted there was a file of 1922. Remember, this was in January, 1927. He asked the attorneys for the taxpayers to designate some representative to view that file in his office, and said he "would be glad to furnish him with any part of it he might desire."

Two attorneys for the taxpayers, Mr. Prettyman and Judge Lacy, were appointed to inspect the file in Mr. Gregg's office in Detroit.

During the inspection of the file Judge Lacy, counsel for the taxpayers, asked Mr. Gregg for permission to have the file overnight so that he might copy from it what he desired to copy. When the attorneys got into the file they found that they needed it all, so they had the entire file photostated and turned the original file back to Mr. Gregg the next morning.

After conclusion of the hearings in Detroit, the board took up the case again in Washington, and on February 12, 1927, this file was introduced into the record, page 2650.

As a result of securing this file, we found a letter from the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] to Hon. David H. Blair, dated February 11, 1922. The letter reads as follows:

I am writing you at your home—

At your home—

because I want you to get this letter. After you read the inclosed, return the whole thing to me, as I want to use it in the future. This refers to the subject of taxation, in so far as it relates to Henry Ford, a matter I have hitherto taken up with you, but which we did not run to a finality. Look this over carefully, and if you deem it worthy of further consideration set somebody to work on it to find out just what there is to it. I shall be very glad if you will do this. With best wishes,

Sincerely yours,

JAMES E. WATSON.

This appears on page 2656 of the transcript of hearings before the Board of Tax Appeals.

To this Commissioner Blair replied under date of February 15:

I am returning the papers which I received from you yesterday. I have made a copy of the statement so as to make another investigation. I shall trace it this time through entirely different channel, and if we get any results we shall let you know. I thank you for calling my attention to it.

Another paper in this file was one dated February 27, 1922, addressed to Mr. Chatterton, assistant to the deputy commissioner, signed by one Paul F. Cain, assistant head special audit division.

At this point I ask unanimous consent to have the complete memorandum placed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEBRUARY 27, 1922.

In re: Ford Motor Co., Detroit, Mich.

Mr. CHATTERTON: With reference to the case mentioned above, which we have been discussing and in which the point as considered by us was the value of March 1, 1913, of the stock of this corporation, you are advised that I find a memorandum dated May 17, 1919, signed by Mr. P. S. Talbert, acting deputy commissioner, in which he arrives at a value of $9,489.34 per share as of March 1, 1913, and in this connection I have worked up three possible methods which might be used in determining the value as of March 1, 1913.

The first and usual method of determining the March 1, 1913, value would be to take the earnings of five years prior to March 1, 1913, and capitalize these earnings on the basis of 10 per cent and consider this as the March 1, 1913, valuation.

In this case it is not possible to secure earnings for the entire five years prior to March 1, 1913, but earnings for four years and five months from October 1, 1908, to February 28, 1913, were secured and show the value of $3,617 as the value of one share of stock of this corporation as of March 1, 1913. The exact means by which this value was determined may be shown as follows:

Earnings October 1, 1908, to February 28, 1913

Four years five months	$31,950,006.93
Earnings 1 month (average)	602,830.32
Earnings 1 year (average)	7,239,963.84
Earnings per share (based on 20,000 shares of capital stock)	361.70
Value based on 10 per cent capitalization	3,617.00

This method, of course, presupposes that average conditions were prevailing from the four years and five months and does not take into account any unusual changes that might have taken place in any period during this period. Since there was a marked change in the general policy in the expansion of the business during the year 1912, it seems to me that it is entirely unfair to use the years prior to 1912 and average the earnings for those years along with 1912 and 1913, when entirely different conditions were prevailing. It seems that in 1912 plans for expansion of the business were set in motion, properties were bought in many sections of the country, assembling plants were constructed, and various other similar factors became a part of the policy of the corporation, all of which would have a decided effect upon the earning capacity and value of stock of the corporation. That such a change did have a decided effect is shown from the fact that the average earnings for the four years and five months prior to March 1, 1913 (even considering 1912 as a part of the period) showed $7,233,963.84, whereas the earnings for the year 1912 were $14,119,989.87 and for the year 1913, $26,651,754.92, and this rate of earnings was continued subsequent to 1913, increasing rather than decreasing. I therefore feel that while it is unusual, at the same time it is entirely reasonable to work on that short period from January 1, 1912, to March 1, 1913, and determine, if possible, a fair value for the stock. Two possible methods may be used. In the first place, we may proceed as follows:

Earnings, Jan. 1, 1912, to Dec. 31, 1912	$14,119,989.87
Earnings, Jan. 1, 1913, to Feb. 28, 1913	3,972,896.17
Total earnings for 14 months	18,092,886.04
Average earnings for 1 month	1,292,349.00
Average earnings for 12 months	15,508,188.00
Earnings per share (20,000 shares)	775.40
Value per share based on 10 per cent capitalization	7,754.00

A second method, and that used in values which are now under consideration, is one slightly different from the one used above, and is as follows:

Earnings Jan. 1, 1912, to Dec. 31, 1912	$14,119,989.87
Earnings, Jan. 1, 1913, to Feb. 28, 1913, $3,972,896.17. Assumed earnings for year 1913 based on earnings for the first 2 months of 1913 ($3,972,896.17 by 6)	23,837,377.02
Total	37,957,366.89
Average for 1 year	18,978,683.44
Earnings per share (20,000 shares)	948.934
Value per share based on capitalization of 10 per cent	9,489.34

Of the two methods outlined above, it would seem to me that the method that has been used in this case is the preferable one, although it does not conform exactly to A. R. M. 34, in that to a certain extent it might be said to take into consideration subsequent years, although I feel this is true only in a slight degree. It will be noted that the earnings for the full year 1912 were considered and then the earnings for 1913 were determined as an estimate based on the earnings which had accrued to March 1, 1913. It would seem reasonable to suppose that a purchaser of this stock could take into consideration that the earnings for 1912 (since the marked change in financial policy and expansion of business) were approximately $14,000,000, and that an amount had been earned during the first two months of 1913 which if continued during 1913 would show an earning of a little less than $24,000,000; that the estimate for the year 1913 based on the first two months was conservative is shown when the earnings for the entire year are finally determined, in that the total earnings for the year are found to be approximately $26,650,000. In view of the fact shown above and the general study I have made of this case, I feel that a fair estimate of the value of this property was arrived at in the figure of $9,489.34, and that this is more nearly correct than either the figure of $3,617 or $7,754, and that the value which has already been used is a fair value.

PAUL F. CAIN,
Assistant Head, Special Audit Division.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I am not going to take up the time of the Senate to have the memorandum read, but will comment on the findings in the memorandum.

Mr. Cain reviews the earnings of the Ford Motor Co. and several estimates of the value of the stock as of March 1, 1913. The value of the stock as of March 1, 1913, is the controversial issue.

After Mr. Cain had elaborately reviewed all of these estimates of the valuation, as appeared in the statement I have put in the RECORD, he concludes his memorandum with the following sentence:

In view of the facts shown above and the general study I have made of this case, I feel that a fair estimate of the value of this property was arrived at in the figure of $9,489.34 and that this is more nearly correct than either the figure of $3,617 or $7,754 and that the value which has already been used is a fair value.

That is a determination of the valuation made by Mr. Roper in the Treasury Department during 1919.

The file to which I have above referred to was marked on its cover "Henry Ford," it evidently being thought that if this valuation was improper or incorrect any additional tax could be made against Henry Ford. This was in error, because it was later disclosed that individual stockholders were the responsible parties.

This file contains another paper, dated May 22, 1922, signed by Special Agent P. L. Roche, of the special intelligence unit, which says in part:

It is further alleged that the sale was consummated and completed upon these figures; that a contract was entered into between Mr. Ford and the vendors above named, by which Mr. Ford agreed to assume all responsibilities in case of any reaudit and reappraisal in the transaction.

If an examination of the records in the bureau at Washington fails to show that an appropriate tax was paid, based on the figures shown in this report, I suggest that a case be jacketed on this matter and referred to this division for investigation.

Another letter in the file is addressed to the chief of special intelligence unit of the Internal Revenue Bureau. That unit is a special unit for the investigation of cases that might not have been handled properly in some other division, or in which there is an indication that fraud may have existed. The letter is from Special Agent Nolan at Chicago, dated May 23, 1922, and in its conclusion says:

It is suggested that an examination of the records of the bureau be made with a view of determining whether a return compatible with the figures mentioned by Special Agent Roche has been made. In the event of a discrepancy sufficient to justify a further investigation appears, it is recommended that the case be jacketed and recommended to this department for investigation.

Another communication in the file, dated June 21, 1922, signed Special Agent J. R. Cox and addressed to Mr. Irey, chief of the Unit, in part says:

At your suggestion, I had an interview on the 17th instant with Mr. Justice, head of the field division, Income Tax Unit. Mr. Justice stated that while he was internal revenue agent in charge at Detroit the returns of the Ford Motor Co. and the individuals who formerly held stock in the Ford Motor Co. were investigated by revenue agents working under his direction; that at the time he was furnished by the bureau with a statement showing the valuations of the Ford Motor Co. properties, as of 1913, which valuation was used by the agents, both in the investigation of the Ford Motor Co.'s returns and in the investigation of the returns of the individuals who had sold stock to Mr. Ford; that it is his understanding that a committee, of which Mr. Talbert was chairman, was sent by the bureau to Detroit and that this committee submitted a confidential report giving the basis for the valuation of the properties, as of 1913; that he did not have a full copy of this confidential report, but was simply furnished by the bureau with the value of the properties that was to be used by the internal revenue agents in their investigation.

Mr. Justice stated also that some time recently a newspaper reporter had been making claims similar to the claims set out in the communication of Special Agent Roche and that, at the suggestion of Mr. Blair, he had had one or more conferences with Senator WATSON, of Indiana, with reference to the matter. In this connection Mr. Justice stated that as a result of the investigation made by the agents working under his direction the Ford Motor Co. was recommended for an assessment of approximately $4,000,000 in additional taxes and that the case is still pending in the bureau. He stated also that he has made several efforts to locate the confidential report submitted by the committee of which Mr. Talbert was chairman fixing the valuation of the properties, as of 1913, with a view to ascertaining on what grounds the valuations were based, but that he has not been able to locate the report within the bureau.

Another letter in the file dated June 22, 1922, addressed to David Nolan, acting special agent of the intelligence unit at Chicago, and signed by Mr. Irey, chief, special intelligence unit, said in part:

Inquiries made in the bureau have developed that information similar to that contained in special report of Special Agent Roche has been received in the bureau on one or more occasions previously; that the returns of the Ford Motor Co. and the individuals who sold their stock have been investigated by internal revenue agents, and that the bureau is fully conversant with all of the details concerning this matter. Under the circumstances there is, of course, no necessity for any further investigation by the special agents at the present time.

Another letter in this file was a letter signed by Mr. M. T. Johnson, chairman of the committee on appeals and reviews, dated September 29, 1922, addressed to Mr. Carl A. Mapes, solicitor of the Internal Revenue Bureau, as follows:

In re: Tax liability of Henry Ford et al.

In accordance with your request I have reviewed the attached file in re tax liability of Henry Ford and others concerned, which grew out of the sale of the Ford Motor Co. stock in June, 1919. It is probable that the attached file has reference to the tax liability of the Ford Motor Co. rather than that of Henry Ford. I can not see how Mr. Ford realized any gain through the purchase of the minority interest in the Ford Motor Co. in June, 1919.

Under date of May 17, 1919, Mr. Talbert, then chief of the technical division of the Income Tax Unit, made a report upon an investigation made by himself, Mr. Burlingame, Mr. King, Mr. Masland, and Mr. Taylor in Detroit with a view to establishing the March 1 value of the Ford Motor Co. stock. This report was addressed to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and was evidently approved by him as the basis for computing gain upon the subsequent sale of such stock. The March 1 value fixed by Mr. Talbert in his report was $9,489.23 per share. The attached file contains the original report addressed to the commissioner and I am inclined to think that the basis used in fixing the March 1 value is sound. It is understood that this stock sold in June, 1919, for $12,000 per share, thereby showing a profit of approximately $2,500 per share upon which it is assumed the stockholders have paid tax.

I am attaching hereto a copy of the net income, average earnings per share, capital, and surplus for the period January 1, 1909, to July 31, 1918. This is a copy of the report in our file in this case.

In view of the consideration which has been given to fixing the March 1 value of this stock for the purpose of computing gain or loss upon the sale thereof in 1919, I believe that the valuation so fixed and approved by the commissioner is fair both to the taxpayer and to the Government and that the case should be considered closed.

To this letter are affixed the words—

Approved, (signed) C. A. Mapes.

He was Solicitor of Internal Revenue at that time.

In this file I note a memorandum, as follows:

Mr. COMMISSIONER: In the light of Mr. Johnson's memo, I concur in the recommendation.

(Signed.) C. A. M.

Before the Board of Tax Appeals in Washington, February 10, 1927, Commissioner Blair, being on the witness stand under oath, was asked this question by Mr. John W. Davis:

You did communicate with Senator WATSON the substance of those memoranda?

To which Mr. Blair answered:

I will assume I did. I have no independent recollection of it.

This shows conclusively that the substance of the memorandum of 1922, to which I have directed your attention, is the same as the memorandum of 1925. There may be some difference in detail, but the controversy was the valuation of the Ford stock as of March 1, 1913.

The evidence I have just referred to clearly indicates that there was much evidence to justify the March 1, 1913, valuation, as determined by the bureau in 1919.

On page 44 of the petitioners' statement of facts before the Board of Tax Appeals there appears a table showing that the original valuation of March 1, 1913, had been approved by 63 official acts confirming the Roper valuation of 1919. This list consists of at least 32 different officials approving of it, including three commissioners, four deputy commissioners, two solicitors of internal revenue, two chairmen of the committee on appeals and review, the chief of special intelligence, three heads of the personal audit division, two revenue agents in charge, four revenue agents, one assistant head of the technical division, and 10 auditors, conferees, and section chiefs, including the chief of the section having charge of stock-sale transactions.

Yet with all these reports on the case, and with 32 officials of the bureau having considered the case, and with these 63 official approvals of the valuation of 1919, I want to call your attention to Mr. Blair's letter handed to me on March 7, 1925, in which he says:

But there appears nothing in the files of the bureau to sustain the correctness of this value.

And, furthermore, that in the same letter he said:

In order to protect the United States it will be necessary to assess against you an additional tax based upon the information now available to the bureau.

The next important incident in this chronology of the case occurred on January 13, 1927, when the Board of Tax Appeals was hearing the case at the Hotel Statler in Detroit.

On January 13, 1927, a Mr. Howe P. Cochran, 831 Munsey Building, and a Mr. W. N. Wood, both of Washington, came to my office about 6 o'clock in the evening with important information concerning this case.

Mr. Cochran expressed his interest in the tax case. He said he had worked up a plan which would result in the case being thrown out of court in five hours. He said he had obtained his information legitimately; that it was a plan he had worked up. He said he would present me with the plan with the understanding that if the case was thrown out by the board on his presentation, he was to have a fee of 5 per cent of the amount saved. If it was rejected on more than one point, but his point was involved, then the fee was to be fixed, fairly. If it was not thrown out on his point, no fee was to be paid him.

Finally Mr. Cochran advised me that if he took the case he would have to first consult with Treasury officials. That appealed to me as rather strange, and I asked him who he was going to see in the Treasury Department. He said, "I am going to see Mr. Gregg." I said, "Mr. Gregg is in Detroit." He then said, "Well, I will see somebody else."

After some conversation I suggested that he come back the next day. About 10.30 the next morning a boy came to the office with a note from Mr. Cochran, which I quote:

JANUARY 14, 1927.

Senator JAMES COUZENS,

Washington, D. C.:

I thank you for the courtesy extended to me last night.

The conclusion we reached, as I understand it, was that I am to give you this new defense.

That you are to use it or not as you see fit.

That if you use it you will give me 5 per cent of the saving attributable to it, and

That in case of any question or difference the whole matter is to be left entirely with you for settlement along the lines that your sense of fair dealing would dictate, and that I am not to complain.

In this connection, I will say that the new defense is nothing that I obtained by any but honorable means, and that it was not obtained from the Treasury Department or Treasury officials. It is a complicated—yet simple and plain—plan worked out by me, but it achieves the ends you seek, which you explained to me.

Mr. Wood thought that I did not make it clear that I expected 5 per cent of the saving on the whole case (as distinguished from your case alone).

As to this, if you did not so understand it, I am sure that the other litigants will, if you suggest it, join in the plan.

With your permission I will call you at 11.30 o'clock to-day.

Yours very truly,

(Signed) HOWE P. COCHRAN.

In the meantime I had made some inquiry concerning Mr. Cochran and ascertained that he had been a clerk in a cotton-brokerage office in New York prior to the war; that he came to Washington and served for a short time as a clerk in the Bureau of Internal Revenue; that he then resigned and went into practice as a tax expert. The inquiry showed that he was not a lawyer nor an auditor.

The information I secured was to the effect that he was quite well known around Washington as being one of the men who knew the inside tax game, and that he was a close friend of Paul Cain, of the Internal Revenue Bureau. This information was sufficient for me to dispose of Mr. Cochran, and my secretary telephoned him about 5 o'clock that I was not interested further in the matter.

Mr. Cochran, however, persisted, and he came to my office on the following day about 10 o'clock, and during a conversation I asked him what interest Paul Cain had in the case.

Remember, that at that time we had not had access to the 1922 file, and I did not know that Mr. Cain was in 1922 assistant head of the special audit division and had written a long opinion affirming the original valuation made by Commissioner Roper.

Mr. Cochran, when I asked him what interest Mr. Cain had in the case, admitted that he had conferred with Mr. Cain about his—Mr. Cochran's—proposition to me. He said that he had known Mr. Cain from the days when they had worked together in the bureau and that never had Mr. Cain given him any information or helped him in any of his cases.

I then dismissed Mr. Cochran, and under date of January 17, 1927, I wrote Mr. Blair, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and pointed out to him that Mr. Cochran had come to my office to solicit tax business, that he had admitted having talked to Mr. Cain, and I thought it was my duty to submit the matter to him, because one of the rules of the Treasury Department under which tax experts are supposed to be disbarred from practice before the departments is for the solicitation of tax business.

To this letter I received a reply from the commissioner in which he stated that the Board of Tax Appeals was not a part of the Treasury Department, and that solicitation of such a case would not come under the regulations as to practice before the Treasury Department. In this letter the commissioner also inclosed a memorandum from Mr. Paul Cain, who, by the way, is still an employee of the bureau, which memorandum, on Treasury Department stationery, dated January 24, 1927, reads as follows:

On January 13, 1927, Mr. H. P. Cochran called me on the telephone at my home and stated that he had phoned the office and was advised that I had been ill for the last week or so. He asked if I were better and whether he could see me for a few moments if he called. I told him that I would see him, and he did call at my home. Mr. Cochran stated that he was about to be employed on the Couzens case, and he asked me if he were employed whether it would hurt his standing in any way with the bureau. My reply was that I did not see that it should, the Couzens case being no different than any other case so far as the department is concerned. He then asked whether his handling of the case would prejudice other cases he had before the bureau. My reply was that I could see no reason why it should. Mr. Cochran then stated that he was sorry that I had been ill, and hoped I would be able to be out soon. He then thanked me and left the house.

I offer for the RECORD the correspondence in this case and ask permission to have it printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The correspondence is as follows:

JANUARY 17, 1927.

Hon. D. H. BLAIR,
Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. COMMISSIONER: About 6.15 p. m. on the evening of January 13, Mr. Howe P. Cochran, 831 Munsey Building, called on me to solicit my interest in engaging him in the case in which former Ford Motor Co. minority stockholders are now appealing to the Board of Tax Appeals in Detroit against the assessment with which you are familiar. He had with him a Mr. Wood, who, I understand, was simply a friend and who made the appointment for me to see Mr. Cochran. Mr. Cochran drew such an alluring picture of the simplicity of his methods of securing results for us that he had my curiosity aroused. So I asked him what he expected out of it, and he said 5 per cent of the saving. Prior to this, however, he stated that before he could take the case he would have to consult with the officials of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, mentioning Mr. Gregg by name. I suggested that Mr. Gregg was in Detroit, and he said there were others in the bureau he could see in his place. The next day he admitted he called on Mr. Paul Cain, who approved of his taking the side against the Government. Early on the morning of the 14th a messenger brought a letter, copy of which I am inclosing, but as I had committee meetings in the morning the messenger was advised that we would call up Mr. Cochran at 5 p. m. However, Mr. Cochran called, so my secretary informs me, at about 11.30 on the 14th and was advised again we would call him at 5 p. m. The letter was at variance in some respects to the conversation we had, the principal difference being that before he could undertake to do anything he would have to get the consent of the officials of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. This seemed so unusual that I gave the matter considerable thought and made some inquiry concerning Mr. Cochran, and decided by 5 o'clock that I would have nothing to do with the matter, and Mr. Cochran was advised by Mr. Carson, my secretary, that I would not take any further interest in the matter. In view of the fact that practitioners before the bureau are, I understand, by rules and regulations prohibited from soliciting business, and because of the peculiar circumstances surrounding this matter, I thought it my duty to submit the whole matter to you. If you desire to take this matter up further, and the original of the letter is necessary, I will be glad to furnish it.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES COUZENS.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, January 24, 1927.

Memorandum

On January 13, 1927, Mr. H. P. Cochran called me on the telephone at my home and stated that he had phoned the office and was advised that I had been ill for the last week or so. He asked if I were better and whether he could see me for a few moments if he called. I told him that I would see him and he did call at my home.

Mr. Cochran stated that he was about to be employed on the Couzens case, and he asked me if he were employed whether it would hurt his standing in any way with the bureau. My reply was that I did not see why it should, the Couzens case being no different than any other case so far as the department is concerned. He then asked whether his handling of the case would prejudice other cases he had before the bureau. My reply was that I could see no reason why it should. Mr. Cochran then stated he was sorry that I had been ill and hoped I would be able to be out soon. He then thanked me and left the house.

PAUL F. CAIN.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, January 28, 1927.

Hon. JAMES COUZENS,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter of January 17 in reference to Mr. Howe P. Cochran, Mr. W. N. Wood, and Mr. Paul F. Cain.

The matter which was discussed with you by Messrs. Cochran and Wood appears to have been a case now pending before the Board of Tax Appeals. The Board of Tax Appeals is not a part of the Treasury and any question of solicitation of a case pending outside the Treasury would not, therefore, come within the Treasury regulations with respect to practice. Mr. Cain's name is mentioned, however, and since he is an employee of the bureau, I have taken a statement from him as to his connection with the matter, copy of which I inclose.

If you believe anything further should be done on this matter I should be glad to hear from you.

Sincerely yours,

D. H. BLAIR, Commissioner.

JANUARY 29, 1927.

Hon. D. H. BLAIR,
Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. COMMISSIONER: I have yours of the 28th acknowledging my letter of the 17th in reference to Messrs. Howe P. Cochran, W. N. Wood, and Paul F. Cain.

You are, of course, much more familiar with the rules and the workings of them than I am, but I did not understand that the rules were confined to such a narrow sphere, namely, that they only apply to tax practitioners in dealing with cases within the bureau. My assumption was that persons permitted to practice before the bureau were not permitted to go out and solicit tax business of any kind, or even permitted to advertise the fact.

However, if your rulings do not cover this particular case, I do not know that there is anything further I can say in the matter, although I think it reprehensible for practitioners before the bureau to go out and solicit tax business under any circumstances.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES COUZENS.

Mr. COUZENS. I desire to emphasize at this point what I consider a perfectly logical conclusion—that Cochran knew of this 1922 file which contained Mr. Cain's, Mr. Johnson's, Mr. Mapes's, and Commissioner Blair's approval of the Roper valuation. No one else, that I know of, outside of the Treasury Department knew of this file.

It is apparent that this information was to be delivered to me if I would arrange to pay 5 per cent on some thirty million of assessments made against my associates and myself. In other words, this former clerk, who had inside information of the bureau, was to obtain a fee of about $1,500,000 for his services.

For a moment I refer back to the efforts of our counsel to secure this file which had not been secured at the time of Mr. Cochran's proposition.

Paul Cain is now a member of the special advisory committee within the bureau which is passing upon cases brought before it. How long is this condition of affairs to continue? It is within the power of Congress to correct it. Taxpayers should not be offered up as victims to this practice.

This recital is directed primarily at my own experience. I have no intention of discontinuing whatever efforts I can exert to putting a stop to this practice.

A prominent attorney has suggested to me that "Jesse Smith in his palmiest days could not have beaten that."

If anyone desires to call this a feud, let him do it, but I construe it as a matter of public interest and a part of my senatorial duties to combat this practice.

At an early date I intend to call up Resolution 173, and at that time I will reply to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], who defended Mr. Mellon on March 22, 1928, pages 5151–5154 of the RECORD.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COUZENS. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. An official of the Treasury Department not now connected with it told me that they were splitting fees four ways on some of the income-tax cases; that if some one against whom an assessment was made might go there, the suggestion would be made that certain people had handled cases of that nature successfully, and that was all. If the man then employed that lawyer, his case was quickly disposed of. I was told by this former official that the fees were split four ways. He declined to let me use his name. He afterwards wrote me the entire facts, but would not stand for his signature; and, of course, I have never pushed the investigation, but it occurred to me again since the Senator has made his statement. He was a man brought here from the Pacific coast who held a very prominent place in the Treasury Department for a while.

Mr. COUZENS. I think I know who he is. I think he probably was removed by the late President Harding.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; I think everybody knows who he is.

Mr. COUZENS. I have no doubt it was Mr. Dover.

MEMORIAL SERVICES FOR THE LATE SENATOR WILLIS

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at 3 o'clock on Friday, May 11, the Senate may hold exercises in commemoration of the life, character, and public services of my late colleague, Senator WILLIS. I am putting the date on Friday instead of on Sunday, so that the exercises may be held during a regular session of the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senate will be in regular session previous to that hour, and at the time stated by the Senator from Ohio he desires that the Senate shall proceed with the memorial exercises?

Mr. FESS. That is correct. I should like to have the order made by unanimous consent.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

FARM RELIEF

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3555) to establish a Federal farm board to aid in the orderly marketing and in the control and disposition of the surplus of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, one of the two amendments that went over from yesterday was the amendment offered by me to section 4 of the bill providing for the appointment of an advisory council. I wish for a moment to read that amendment and then to discuss it very briefly. The amendment is as follows:

SEC. 4. (a) Whenever the board determines that any agricultural commodity may thereafter require stabilization by the board through marketing agreements authorized by this act, or whenever the cooperative associations, or other organizations representative of the producers of the commodity, shall apply to the board for the creation and appointment of the advisory council for such commodity, then the board shall notify the President of such determination or application. The President shall thereupon create an advisory council for the commodity. The advisory council shall be composed of seven members to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. No individual shall be eligible for appointment to a commodity advisory council unless he resides in the region in which the commodity is principally grown and is a producer of the commodity or interested in the production or marketing of such commodity. Prior to the making of any appointment to a commodity advisory council the board shall transmit to the President for his consideration lists of individuals qualified for appointment, to be submitted to the board by cooperative associations or other organizations representative of the producers of the commodity. The term of office of a member of any commodity advisory council shall be two years. In the event of a vacancy occurring the President shall fill such vacancy in the same manner as the originally appointed member, and should Congress not be in session, such appointee shall hold office until 20 days after the convening of the next session of Congress.

Mr. President, this suggested provision came about in this way: Under amendments that have already been adopted by the Senate it is provided that a majority of the advisory council shall have a veto power upon the board in the matter of putting a commodity in a marketing period or taking it out of a marketing period, or putting on the equalization fee, and other matters pertaining exclusively to the commodity. When that provision as to veto power was submitted to those interested in cooperatives here they suggested that there should be a provision for the President to appoint the advisory council. That met the approval of all of those of us who were engaged, as has heretofore been pointed out, in trying to perfect the bill.

I wish to say just a word or two as to why, in my judgment, the Senate should adopt such a provision. If we are to have an advisory council it ought to have some independence; it ought not to be created by the board that it is to advise. If the board can create the council and uncreate it at will, the council would not have the temerity to interfere with whatever the board should do. There would be every reason why an advisory council thus constituted should agree to the recommendations of the board, and, so, virtually the provision for a veto power on the part of the advisory council would be useless unless the council should be independently appointed.

When we came to the question of appointing the advisory council it was deemed that surely if the President could represent the farmers in appointing the board he ought to be permitted to represent the farmers in appointing the advisory council. If it is wrong to give the President the power to appoint an advisory council, from the farmers' standpoint it would be equally wrong, and even more wrong, perhaps, to give him the right to appoint the entire board. In my judgment, the amendment provides the only feasible and proper course of action. It provides the only way by which to give the advisory council an independent status, so that the board may have the benefit of its disinterested or interested advice, as the case may be. In other words, if the advisory council is to be dependent upon the board that creates it, we need not expect anything except that the advisory council will advise the board in the way that it thinks that the board wants to be advised.

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. McKELLAR. Did the Senator from Idaho wish to interrupt me?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it may be that the view of the Senator from Tennessee is the correct view as between the two propositions which have been presented; but I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that we have not as yet reached the individual farmer.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; we have not.

Mr. BORAH. And the farmer is the one who will have to pay the equalization fee.

Mr. McKELLAR. What the Senator says is absolutely true; but by the amendment offered we bring it nearer to the farmer than under any other provision. The Senator recalls, as the Senate will recall, that last year we provided that a majority of the farmers in convention should put on the fee. The President, however, objected to that arrangement, so this provision was framed.

Mr. President, it is suggested that if the President shall appoint the council it will not represent the farmer. Let us look at the amendment. The amendment provides:

Prior to the making of any appointment to a commodity advisory council the board shall transmit to the President for his consideration lists of individuals qualified for appointment, to be submitted to the board by cooperative associations or other organizations representative of the producers of the commodity.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield in a moment. It is true that the President does not have to appoint from such lists, but I say that the President would appoint from them; and if there were some objection in the case of any individual appointment, and he appointed some one whose name was not upon the list, then there would be a check on him, because the Senate would have to confirm the appointment. If, on the other hand——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield in a moment. On the other hand, if the board appoints from these lists, or if it fails to appoint, there is no check on the board at all. The same list that would go to the board would go to the President in the other case.

The farmers do not select those men; the different organizations send in names to the board, and there are various organizations in every State; in my State there are three different organizations that I can recall. In the one case, if the names are presented, as they will be presented to the board, and the board does not select the ones the farmers want, the farmer has got no recourse; but in the other case where the same lists are presented to the President and the President does not appoint whom the farmers want, they have got a right to appeal to this body before the member is confirmed. So it seems to me that for every reason the safe plan and the orderly plan is to have the appointments made by the President in the first instance, to be confirmed by the Senate.

I now yield to the Senator from Ohio, and then I will yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. FESS. The Senator has really answered the question I had in mind by what he has said since I rose. I was going to say that any attempt to limit the power of the President in the appointments would likely be regarded as unconstitutional.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. FESS. The Senator does not attempt to do that in his amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all.

Mr. FESS. This is merely a recommendation to the President, and he is not limited to it?

Mr. McKELLAR. He is not limited to it. The lists are presented to him from which to select the members whom he wants to serve on the board.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to say merely a word, and I desire the attention of the Senator from Ohio for a moment. There is no restriction upon the right of the President as to the appointment of any particular person who may be recommended. The names are recommended to him for his consideration. He is not told that he must appoint any one of them, but he is told in the bill that he must appoint a producer of the commodity. Does the Senator contend that that latter provision is a restriction which is unauthorized by the Constitution?

Mr. FESS. No; I do not. That would be in keeping with the appointment of members of the Federal Reserve Board, the law providing that persons of certain qualifications shall be appointed.

Mr. SIMMONS. And it is in keeping with the acts which we have passed, in which it has been provided in the case of certain boards that the President must appoint two of one party and three of another.

Mr. FESS. When I read the amendment I thought, at first blush, the President was limited to those who were named by the associations.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator will recall that the bill last year provided for such a limitation and that the Attorney General gave that as one of the reasons why he thought the bill might be unconstitutional.

Mr. FESS. That is why I raised the question.

Mr. McKELLAR. That has been eliminated from this bill. It has been eliminated as to the appointment of the main board and also eliminated as to the appointment of the advisory council. I think the Senator will agree that this is the orderly way; it is the only way that this advisory council can be really made effective. All that it is, and all that it is intended to be, is a check upon the unlimited authority of the board to put on, say, the equalization fee, or a marketing period, or stop the equalization fee or stop a marketing period. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator think that it would be a practical proposition simply to provide in the bill that the advisory board should be selected from and elected by the producers of a particular commodity?

Mr. McKELLAR. If that could be done I should infinitely prefer it. If the Senator can suggest a plan by which that may be done, I am perfectly willing, speaking individually, to have such a plan as that adopted. I repeat, I would infinitely prefer it.

Mr. SMITH. May I ask the Senator from Idaho to repeat the suggestion he just made? I was occupied and did not hear it.

Mr. BORAH. I asked the Senator if he thought it was a practical proposition simply to provide in the bill that the advisory board should be selected and elected by the producers of the particular commodity.

Mr. SMITH. May I make this suggestion, if the Senator will allow me: I do not know how this would affect the wheat growers or the cattle growers, but there are only seven members of this advisory counsel to represent the vast area in cotton. Even the California and Arizona people, of course, would be interested, because the marketing of the ordinary bulk of the cotton affects theirs; so that we would have about 13 States out of which to select a council of 7.

I agree with the Senator from Idaho that if there is any feasible plan by which we could get the advisory council to represent the majority of the farmers engaged in the production of this article, then we certainly would be on safe ground; but just how to do that practically is one of the difficulties that I do not see how to get around.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator from Idaho, if he has such a proposal in his mind, will put it in writing and offer it as an amendment. I am frank to say to the Senator that it seemed to me to be the proper way to arrange this matter; but in studying the question I have found no method by which the members of the advisory council can be elected. It would be better if the farmers elected or selected their own representatives. I am in hearty sympathy with that, and, if it can be arranged practically, I should be perfectly willing to accept it; but, next to that, I think the best check that we can place upon the matter of seeing that the farmers are truly represented is to have the President appoint the members, and if the farmers are not properly represented they will appeal to this body, and the nominees will not be confirmed.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator wants the farmers to have their own agents, what is wrong with the modification of the amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be happy to get to that right at this minute.

Mr. CARAWAY. I just want an answer to that question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will answer the Senator's question, but I can not answer it in a word.

The Senator says that the farmers will have control of the matter if his amendment is adopted. Now, what does his amendment provide? It provides simply that the board itself shall appoint these men from lists furnished by the farmers.

Let us assume that there are three great farmers' organizations in my State and each one of them sends in the names of 10 men for appointment on the cotton board. There are 30 names, to begin with, for this board to select seven members from. The Senator's amendment does not provide that they shall be selected from the cotton farmers at all. The board can appoint anybody they please.

Mr. CARAWAY. No, Mr. President.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will read the Senator's amendment.

Mr. CARAWAY. The board must appoint the ones that the farmers select.

Mr. McKELLAR. Who is going to select them? There is not going to be any convention of farmers. There is not going to be any convention of organizations. There is no arrangement for the farmers to select them. The secretary of one board may send in some names. The president of another board may send in some names. Another board may have a meeting and send in some names. That will not be a selection by the farmers. It will be a selection by certain officers and agents of these various concerns; and even then it will not be a selection, because the board here, out of this vast array of names, can select anyone they want.

Mr. CARAWAY. I wish the Senator would read the amendment, instead of putting his construction on it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be delighted to read it. I have it right here before me.

Mr. CARAWAY. The amendment says that the board shall name the ones the farm organizations ask to have named.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator's amendment provides:

> The advisory council shall be composed of seven members, to be appointed by the board—

From what? From those that the farmers say? Not at all—> from a list submitted to the board——

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator will read the amendment, instead of interjecting his remarks——

Mr. McKELLAR. Just a minute—> to be appointed by the board from a list submitted to the board by cooperative associations or other organizations representative of the producers of the commodity.

That is exactly the same position that the President is in. The farmers do not select them. The board here selects them from the various lists that come in from all over the country. That is all there is in it.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is a little bit better than the Senator's proposal. He lets the President name them from any list that he sees fit.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; that is not better, for this reason: If the farmers are dissatisfied after the President names them, they can communicate with their representatives in the Senate of the United States and the Senate of the United States can reject any man to whom they object.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, just a minute. The amendment which the Senator never finished, because he wanted to make his speech between the reading of one line and the next, provides that the farmers may have removed any agent that they do not like.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall take great pleasure in reading it all. Let us see what it says. I want all Senators listening to me now to see what is provided by the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. I wish the Senator would just read it without making a speech upon it.

Mr. McKELLAR. The substitute of the Senator from Arkansas is as follows:

SEC. 4. (a) Whenever the board determines that any agricultural commodity may thereafter require stabilization by the board through marketing agreements authorized by this act, or whenever the cooperative associations, or other organizations representative of the producers of the commodity, shall so decide, the board shall create and appoint an advisory council for such commodity. The advisory council shall be composed of seven members to be appointed by the board from a list submitted to the board by cooperative associations or other organizations representative of the producers of the commodity. In the event of a vacancy occurring, the board shall fill such vacancy in the same manner as the original appointment. The power to remove a member of the advisory council rests with the board, but may be exercised only with the consent of the cooperative association or other organizations representative of the producers of the commodity for which he was appointed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Tennessee a question? Instead of leaving it to the President to appoint from a list recommended by the associations or organizations representing the producers, or instead of leaving it to the board to appoint from a list recommended by the associations or organizations representing the producers, would it be a practical proposition to provide that the associations or organizations representing the producers shall elect this board?

Mr. McKELLAR. That was substantially the provision in the old bill to which the President took exception on the ground that it was unconstitutional.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator will pardon me, the question was asked of both of us.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am sorry I took precedence over the Senator. I yield to him.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, no; pardon me.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is all right.

Mr. CARAWAY. I just wanted to make this suggestion while the Senator was still on the floor: If they shall be selected under the amendment offered by myself, by just changing a few words they could be elected by the organizations, and I should have no objection to the change. Inasmuch as it is not the board but the advisory council, and the President has nothing to do with the appointment, we could make it absolutely the instrument of the farmer; and I should have no objection to that change.

Mr. McKELLAR. What organizations would you have come in—all farm organizations or just cooperative associations?

Mr. BORAH. All associations or organizations dealing with that commodity.

Mr. McKELLAR. Would marketing associations come in? I am just wondering what would be included.

Mr. BORAH. All organizations of producers of the commodity.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. This very question arose when we were considering this question when the first bill was presented. It was taken up and seriously considered and deliberated upon by a very large committee representing the Southern States in connection with the cotton interests; and we found this situation had to be dealt with.

If the appointment had to be made of persons who were recommended by the cooperatives and the farm organizations, how were we to bring about harmony in the recommendations between, probably, 50 or 60 of these different organizations, or maybe a hundred of them, scattered about in the Southern States? A list presented by the cooperative and farm organizations of North Carolina might be wholly unsatisfactory to the cooperative and farm organizations of South Carolina, and those of South Carolina might be unsatisfactory to those of Texas. How were we going, therefore, to get a consensus of the wishes with reference to the appointment of these seven men from these organizations scattered through the 13 States producing cotton.

That difficulty we sought to solve in a very comprehensive way, as we thought, by authorizing a State convention of the farmers engaged in producing cotton in each of these States; but then we had 13 States holding 13 conventions, and probably making 13 different recommendations with reference to men, which might not harmonize. A man selected upon the recommendation from South Carolina might be exceedingly obnoxious to the cotton farmers of my State, and vice versa. We dealt with that question as effectively as it would seem to us to be possible to deal with it.

Mr. BORAH. I realize the difficulty involved.

Mr. SIMMONS. But this proposition does not deal with it with half the effectiveness that that proposition does. This proposition provides for probably two or three hundred different recommendations that may be entirely in conflict. Therefore, we sought to solve this question by saying that all of these associations might make recommendations to the President, but the President was not bound by the recommendations of any of them, although he must, in the last analysis, select a man who was a producer of cotton.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment. I want to get what is going on in the mind of the Senator from Idaho. Is this what the Senator suggests?

The advisory council shall be composed of seven members to be elected by members of the various agricultural associations producing such commodity under such rules and regulations as the several associations in joint assembly agree upon.

How would you get their views unless you provide something like that?

Mr. BORAH. That is arriving at the point which I have in mind. Let me state, before I answer the question specifically, that I look at it in this way:

You are proposing in this bill, in case it meets the judgment of the board, to take over the marketing of these commodities.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. And you are proposing, in case it meets the judgment of the board, to levy a fee upon the individual producer. Now, in my opinion it is not only a matter of justice, but it is absolutely necessary as a practical proposition to secure the consent of the individual producer or to give him an opportunity to register his consent, if he wants to, if you expect this plan to work; because just so surely as you impose upon him a plan in which he has not a voice, and feels that he has not been given an opportunity to have a voice, there will be a blowup when you undertake to collect this fee without his consent.

That is what I have in mind.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the point that the Senator has in mind is one that we all have in mind; and if the Senator will formulate language that will carry out that idea I shall be delighted to accept it, so far as I can do so.

Mr. SIMMONS. If it does it any better than this bill does.

Mr. BORAH. I think the language can be formulated in a few minutes.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I should like to state to the Senator from Idaho that already the different cooperative associations have periodical meetings representing all the States. It seems to me it would be perfectly feasible for other organizations representing cotton to meet in their States, elect delegates to a general convention, and there, representing all of the associations dealing with cotton, they could elect seven men fairly representative of the whole cotton district, and in that respect representing the entire cotton industry.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I suggest that the Federal reserve system has means by which the member banks select their directors. It is rather cumbersome, but it suggests a method. It would appear to me that, instead of trying to have all the producers of a commodity meet in a convention, each association might, by correspondence or otherwise, authorize somebody to cast their vote, and it would be a representative meeting. That is merely the mechanics of the amendment, which could be quickly framed, if the principle were agreed upon.

Mr. BORAH. I think so.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Idaho a question, to see if I have this correct. The last portion of an amendment already adopted, on page 7 of the reprinted bill, reads as follows:

No equalization fee shall be collected unless the estimates upon which the determination of the amount of the equalization fee is based are concurred in by the advisory council for the commodity.

In other words, the advisory council, however formed, as I interpret that amendment, would have absolute control as to when an equalization fee should be collected, whether any should be collected at all, and what the amount should be. It seems to me that that would take from the board every real major responsibility, as far as the administration of the equalization fee was concerned. Is that a correct interpretation?

Mr. BORAH. It would limit the powers of the board, but the board would have tremendous power after that was taken away.

Mr. EDGE. Not over the equalization fee. They could not even go on with the equalization fee.

Mr. BORAH. No; but the man who pays the equalization fee ought to have a voice. I am much more interested in the man who pays it than in the man who administers it.

Mr. EDGE. But under that language, he not only would have a voice, but would have absolute control of the situation, would he not?

Mr. BORAH. No. The amendment provides:

No marketing period under section 7 in respect of any agricultural commodity shall be commenced or terminated unless the advisory council for such commodity concurs in the respective finding or findings which the board is required to make prior to the commencement or termination of the marketing period. No equalization fee shall be collected unless the estimates upon which the determination of the amount of the equalization fee is based are concurred in by the advisory council for the commodity.

That is, before you collect your fee, you must have concurrence of the advisory council, and the advisory council is supposed to represent the man who is paying the fee.

Mr. EDGE. Exactly, but you are not only not permitted to collect the fee, you are not permitted to impose it. In other words, you are not permitted to put into effect the plan of equalization.

Mr. BORAH. That is right.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I think it is likely that we can arrange an amendment that will be satisfactory all around, and for the present I yield the floor until we determine that question.

Mr. McNARY. Inasmuch as there is an effort being made, and fair prospects of coming to a common agreement——

Mr. McKELLAR. Just fair prospects.

Mr. McNARY. I would suggest again that this amendment be temporarily laid aside, and that we take up some other amendment. I ask unanimous consent that that course be followed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRAZIER in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. McKELLAR. What other amendment is there?

Mr. McNARY. Has not the Senator a further amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; there is one other amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. McNARY. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin who desires to present an amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to amend by striking out commencing after the word "corporation," on page 12, line 20, down to and including the word "products" on line 10, page 13.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 12, line 20, after the word "corporation," strike out down to and including the word "products" on line 10, page 13, in the following words:

If the board is of the opinion that there is no such cooperative association or corporation created and controlled by one or more such associations capable of carrying out any marketing agreement for purchase, withholding, and disposal, then the board may enter into the agreement with other agencies but shall not unreasonably discriminate between such other agencies.

(f) During a marketing period fixed by the board for any commodity, the board may enter into marketing agreements for the purchase, withholding, and disposal of the food products of such commodity, and all provisions of this section applicable to marketing agreements for the purchase, withholding, and disposal of a surplus of the commodity shall apply to the agreements in respect of its food products.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I would not want to press for a vote on that amendment at this time. I prefer that it go over for consideration a little later on, under the unanimous consent agreement requested by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin if he is willing to debate this proposal now? I think there is no other amendment to be brought forward at this time.

Mr. FESS. Has the amendment relating to the allocation of the fund been acted upon?

Mr. McNARY. No, that has not been acted upon.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I will be very glad to state my reason for submitting the amendment, but I hesitate in having it acted upon until the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] is present.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I send to the desk two amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an amendment pending. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HARRISON. Let us have the amendment reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the amendment.

The legislative clerk read the amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, by referring to the reprinted bill containing the amendments agreed to yesterday, it will be seen that on page 13, line 7, it is proposed by my amendment to strike out these words in subparagraph (e):

If the board is of the opinion that there is no such cooperative association or corporation created or controlled by one or more such associations capable of carrying out any marketing agreement for purchase, withholding, and disposal, then the board may enter into the agreement with other agencies but shall not unreasonably discriminate between such other agencies.

The next paragraph, which I also move to strike out, may be read in connection with what I have just read from the bill, as follows:

During a marketing period fixed by the board for any commodity, the board may enter into marketing agreements for the purchase, withholding, and disposal of the food products of such commodity, and all provisions of this section applicable to marketing agreements for the purchase, withholding, and disposal of a surplus of the commodity, shall apply to the agreements in respect of its food products.

I desire to direct attention to what may and will happen under those provisions unless stricken out. I am going to outline how the provision will operate. Following the World War the expeditionary forces abroad had large surpluses of certain commodities. There were also existing contracts during the war, and manufacturers had accumulated a surplus of the products under those contracts. There was a settlement made with respect to all those matters. In some instances the Government purchased commodities at the war price, resold them abroad at the world price or less than the world price, and, in some instances, to the very parties from whom the Government purchased the commodities originally.

That statement is made only by way of illustration of what can and no doubt may be done under this provision. Here, we will say, is a milling company that has flour or wheat, or a packing company that has meat products. The Government, through the board, may enter into agreements with such agencies and purchase those surpluses upon the theory that they will, in effect, take the surpluses, to whatever extent the accumulations may be of such commodities, off to the domestic market. Then the packing companies or the milling companies, or whatever corporations may be engaged along those lines, may have a subsidiary some place outside of America, and the board may then turn around and sell those commodities, purchased at the advanced rate, to such subsidiaries for such sum as they may choose, but we will presume at the rate afforded by the foreign market.

This process can be repeated, with the result that the losses reflected in those transactions will be made up by imposing the equalization fee upon all farmers who are producers of the respective commodities. Therefore, it is possible, under these provisions, for the board to enter into such agreements with other parties or other agencies at the enhanced price in the purchase of the products which they are holding, and then sell them in the foreign markets to subsidiaries of the people from whom the products were purchased, and the farmer will be required to pay that loss through the equalization fee.

I submit that these provisions of the bill ought to be stricken out.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think a more careful reading of the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin perhaps would not have brought forth the discussion which he has just presented. The bill proceeds upon the theory that the board shall act through cooperative organizations or farm groups. If the task is found too large and the agencies are not able, as admitted trading factors, to carry on the transactions, or if they are not in existence, the board has a right to employ such existing agencies, whether they be millers, packers, independent packers, or what not, to take charge of the produce, withhold surplus or, like a miller would, convert wheat into flour and sell it, the charges and costs being paid by the board out of the equalization fee. They are simply agencies for the purpose of sales when other cooperative agencies are not in existence.

If this administrative feature were taken out of the bill, speaking with the greatest kindness to the Senator, if the board were attempting to withhold a surplus or purchase a surplus and sell it abroad and the cooperatives were not strong enough to undertake the work and did not have time to organize and give its strength to the new organization, it would be entirely unable to function. That language was put in the bill after the most careful study by those farmers who have given the matter most serious consideration for years, so they might have strong instrumentalities to do the job when they could not do it themselves.

There is no possibility of any advantage being taken of the farmer. The estimated costs and charges are made known before the operation takes place. It simply gives them the advantage of existing agencies when they have not any of their own. It would cripple the administration of the bill and take away from the ability of the farmers and the producers of the country to get the best that is in the bill by this sort of amendment being agreed to, and it is so manifest, in my judgment, and so clear of comprehension that I express the hope that the Senator will not insist on his amendment, and if he does, that the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I appreciate all that the Senator from Oregon has said. I have studied the amendment carefully, analyzed it, and I think what he has said with respect to the agents is in part correct. He did not go quite far enough. Of course, there may be cooperatives or lack of cooperative organizations to take care of the commodities, but the whole theory of the bill is to bring about cooperation. As the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] said the other day, it is argued that those who favor the bill urge cooperation, and those who are opposed to the bill urge cooperation among the farmers. If the bill is going to accomplish cooperative undertakings through the compulsory process of the equalization fee, or through any other source, the board ought not to have the power to enter into agreements with packing companies, milling companies, flour manufacturers, agencies to purchase cotton, agencies that purchase processed milk, or cheese, or butter, because if they are to have that privilege, then we have destroyed the very thing designed by the bill.

Moreover, the Senator from Oregon has not answered my proposition that with the power in the board to adopt private agencies, agencies outside of the farm organizations, as a means of disposing of the surplus products, those same agencies will have subsidiaries in the world market and they will purchase the same products from the board which were previously purchased by the board from those who in this country control the subsidiaries, with only one result, and that is that the farmer will have to go down into his pocket to pay the loss upon that transaction, a transaction beneficial to those who are to-day exploiting the farmer and his produce.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. McMASTER. Assuming, for the sake of argument, the correctness of the statement made by the Senator from Wisconsin, what would the Senator suggest in lieu of that portion of the bill which he is proposing to strike out? What remedy has he in case the farmers, through their cooperative associations, are not able to handle the produce? Has the Senator provided a remedy for that situation?

Mr. BLAINE. Let the board be the agency to make the purchase and sale as provided in the bill, through the farmers' agencies.

Mr. McMASTER. Does the Senator's amendment include that provision?

Mr. BLAINE. Of course, I am trying to have stricken out of the bill that which I believe is pernicious, and I am going to be perfectly frank about it. If provisions of this character are left in the bill, I can not support it and will not support it. I know there are other Senators who feel likewise.

Mr. McMASTER. That has not anything to do with the question I am asking. After the Senator has stricken this language from the bill, does he leave the bill in such a shape that the surplus commodities can be taken care of?

Mr. BLAINE. If it is not in such shape as that, I would be very glad to draft an amendment which would put it in proper shape, and I am sure the committee would be very glad to do it.

Mr. McMASTER. That is not necessary. The main object of the bill is to create a marketing agency for the surplus; and, of course, if the Senator has perfected his amendment, and it will accomplish that purpose, and accomplish it fully, then there will be no question about its acceptance.

Mr. BLAINE. But the proponents of this bill suggest that the bill itself accomplishes the purpose.

Mr. McMASTER. They suggested that it accomplishes the purpose through the language that is written into the bill. If the Senator can perfect that by adopting some other method, that, of course, will accomplish the purpose.

Mr. BLAINE. No; the proponents of this bill, as I have listened to this debate for days and days, say that this bill is going to promote cooperation, and through cooperation the farmer will enter the world markets and handle his surplus products; that he can not do it as an individual; that he must do it in combination, and this combination is a cooperative association. Now, if that is not the theory of the bill——

Mr. McMASTER. It does not make any difference——

Mr. BLAINE. Wait just a moment. If the theory of this bill is to deny that there can be and will be sufficient cooperation to do the things designed by the bill and that it becomes necessary to permit private agencies again to take care of the farmer, you are doing worse than nothing.

Mr. McMASTER. It is not a question of theory—the theory of the Senator from Wisconsin or the theory of anyone else. The question is, Have you adopted in this bill practical methods of taking care of the surplus production of the farmer? It does not make any difference about theories. If the amendment which the Senator proposes to the bill accomplishes that, let us understand it in that way.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLAINE. Just a moment. The Senator is placing a responsibility upon me. I am not responsible for this bill. I had nothing to do——

Mr. McMASTER. I do not care anything about who is responsible for the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Wait until I get through, please.

Mr. McMASTER. That does not make a particle of difference. I simply want to know whether the Senator is perfecting this bill or not.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I ask for order. I can not discuss this matter when I have to yell in order to overcome those who interrupt me without my having yielded.

Mr. McMASTER. The Senator yielded to me or I would not have asked him the question.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, if it becomes necessary to turn the debate into a competition of strength of voice, I shall have to compete with the Senator; but I am not willing to do that.

Mr. McMASTER. The Senator from Wisconsin will win without competition.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATERMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BLAINE. Just a moment.

The Senator from South Dakota has asked, Does my amendment perfect this bill? It certainly does. It takes out the very provision that makes this bill futile as a farm-relief measure; and so it is not a question of my drawing an amendment. There is no amendment necessary if the theory of this bill is correct. If this iniquitous provision is taken out of the bill, and if the bill does not contain provisions that will take care of these surplus products without a substitution of words in place of this amendment, then the bill is not worth consideration as a farm-relief measure.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BLAINE. I do.

Mr. BROOKHART. In answer to the question of the Senator from South Dakota, in which I think myself there is a good deal of merit, in the substitute I have offered I have taken care of that proposition affirmatively; and I shall be glad if the Senator from Wisconsin will yield to permit me to explain how it is done.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, that is what I have been desiring to hear—an explanation. I did not want to have abuse when I was asking for information.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I have not yielded to the Senator from South Dakota; and when he talks about being abused I want to refute that, if he accuses the Senator from Wisconsin of abusing him. I was engaged in no abuse of anyone.

Mr. McMASTER. Yes; well——

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I have not yielded to the Senator from South Dakota——

Mr. McMASTER. I thought the Senator yielded to me.

Mr. BLAINE. And I propose to keep the floor until there is a request for me to yield.

Mr. McMASTER. I thought——

Mr. BLAINE. I have yielded to the Senator from Iowa to make a statement.

Mr. BROOKHART. The question of dealing with the processors, the packers, and the millers can only be reached in case you include in this bill an affirmative plan of determining the price of products; and, of course, I have made that the basic idea of the substitute I have offered. I have instructed the Department of Agriculture, under well-defined rules, most of which are in operation now in the department, to determine the average cost of production for a five-year period, including in that the 5 per cent return on the capital invested; and that is to determine the price. Then, when it comes to dealing with packers—and I concede that that may be necessary temporarily, before we can get these cooperatives organized to handle this thing—I have provided in my substitute that they shall pay this basic price to the farmers themselves. This price is bid by the Government corporation which I have established, not to the board of trade or the cotton exchange or millers or packers, but to the farmer.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, may I ask a question?

Mr. BROOKHART. If these institutions have paid the same price to the farmer, and then have added to it only enough to give them the 5 per cent capital return on their investment that the farmers would get, then——

Mr. McMASTER. As I understand the Senator from Iowa, he is explaining his amendment, not the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BROOKHART. If this amendment and the other were adopted, it would take the place of what the Senator from Wisconsin wants to strike out. The Senator from Wisconsin, of course, has the right to strike out just what he regards as an evil situation in the bill. I think he is right there.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Wisconsin having yielded, will the Senator from Iowa yield for a question?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I have sympathy with the statement of the Senator that he has not any particular objections to allowing the packers or millers to do this work until the cooperatives get upon their feet. I have sympathy with that statement; but there is this element in it: The cooperatives are identical in their interests with the farmers, in that they would be farmers' organizations, while the others provided in the bill could afford to let the losses be whatever they might be; they do not suffer them. It seems to me that there is a distinctive difference there.

Mr. BROOKHART. There is a very distinctive difference in the power given the board. There is no doubt about that. This board would have the power, for instance, to supply this stuff to the packers at a high price, and then sell it to the same packers on the other side at a low price, and then collect the difference in the loss on the surplus out of the equalization fee. That power is evidently conferred by this section—a very dangerous power.

Mr. FESS. What I had in mind was that if the agency that does it is a farmers' agency, their interest is uniform, while in the other case it is quite different.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is very true; but, of course, there would be some power. The board, by its form of contract or by the use of its discretion, could prevent much of that evil; but, on the other hand, if the board was influenced or did not understand the inside of this enough, it might be imposed on to a very great extent.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, it is to be appreciated that there is an entire difference between the substitute amendment presented by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] and this bill. Under the substitute presented by the Senator from Iowa there is no equalization fee whatever. He sets up an entirely different plan. If his plan were in operation, and there were losses on these contracts or agreements made by packers and millers, the board could not go down into the pockets of the farmer to pay those losses.

Mr. McNARY. Where would it go?

Mr. BLAINE. It would go into the fund provided therefor. I am sorry that provision even is in the Senator's bill; but, since he has fixed a basis whereby the farmer must be paid a price by private agencies to cover cost of production and a reasonable profit, the farmer will not lose; but under this bill, if there is a loss, the board will go down into the pockets of the farmer to pay that loss to the packers and the millers; and I do not think there is any necessity for any amendment to be inserted in lieu of the provisions which I propose to be stricken out.

I think the amendment that I have proposed perfects the bill to that extent, and that there ought not to be any provision in this bill for these marketing agreements between any other agencies than cooperative agencies and voluntary farm organizations. If this board is permitted to make agreements with millers and packers and other great organizations and combinations, they will have a firmer grip on the producer. They now have too firm a grip on the farmer through their combinations. They have their lobbies. They have their highly paid attorneys. They will procure suites at the hotels at Washington and, with lavishly furnished headquarters, maintain here a battery of lawyers and experts to deal and dicker with this board on these commodities, while the farmer is back upon his farm following the plow, tending his stock, sowing in the springtime, cultivating through the seasons, and harvesting in the autumn. He has no lawyers, no experts, no accountants to send to Washington. He has no battery of lawyers. He can not maintain these palatial headquarters in this city to look after his interests. If we are to draw from the experience of the past, it must be recognized that when you set up this scheme it will be an uneven and an unfair contest between the men upon the farms and the packers and the millers and those who control the marketing of the farmers' produce.

Why, Mr. President, this proposal is merely to write into the law a declaration of policy that these things will continue and that they are right. Yes; your combinations will still exist. The control will still exist far worse than under the present conditions. This board may sell those commodities to the subsidiaries of these organizations dealing in the foreign trade and the foreign market. Under this bill the farmer will be compelled to go down into his pocket and pay an equalization fee sufficient to make up the loss. You can not perfect this bill by any substitution of this language. If you are going to permit marketing agreements of agencies other than cooperative and voluntary farm agencies, in fairness to the worker upon the farm it can only rightfully be done as provided in the substitute of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART].

I hope that this amendment will be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE].

Mr. BLAINE. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, may the amendment be stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 12 of the original bill, line 20, it is proposed to strike out all after the word "corporation" down to and including the word "food products," in line 10 of page 13.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, there are so very few Senators in the Chamber I wonder if we might not have the amendment restated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will restate the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 12 of the original bill it is proposed to strike out after the word "corporation," in line 20, all down to and including the words "food products," in line 10, on page 13.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I suggest that there be read what it is proposed to strike out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read, as suggested by the Senator from Virginia.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] proposes to strike out the following language:

If the board is of the opinion that there is no such cooperative association or corporation created and controlled by one or more such associations capable of carrying out any marketing agreement for purchase, withholding, and disposal, then the board may enter into the agreement with other agencies but shall not unreasonably discriminate between such other agencies.

(f) During a marketing period fixed by the board for any commodity, the board may enter into marketing agreements for the purchase, withholding, and disposal of the food products of such commodity, and all provisions of this section applicable to marketing agreements for the purchase, withholding, and disposal of a surplus of the commodity shall apply to the agreements in respect of its food products.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FESS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], but I find that I can transfer the pair to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. KING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], but I find that I may transfer, and I do transfer, my pair with that Senator to the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], but I am informed that if he were present, he would vote as I intend to vote. I am, therefore, at liberty to vote, and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] is unavoidably absent. If he were present, he would vote "nay" on the pending motion.

Mr. CARAWAY. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] on account of illness. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce the general pair of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL].

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE], and that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY].

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 57, as follows:

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask that it may be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out section 8, as amended, as follows:

EQUALIZATION FEE

SEC. 8. (a) In order to carry out marketing and nonpremium insurance agreements in respect of any agricultural commodity without loss to the revolving fund, each marketed unit of such agricultural commodity shall, throughout any marketing period in respect of such commodity, contribute ratably its equitable share of the losses, costs, and charges arising out of such agreements. Such contributions shall be made by means of an equalization fee apportioned and paid as a regulation of interstate and foreign commerce in the commodity. It shall be the duty of the board to apportion and collect such fee in respect of such commodity as hereinafter provided.

(b) Prior to the commencement of any marketing period in respect of any agricultural commodity, and thereafter from time to time during such marketing period, the board shall estimate the probable losses, costs, and charges to be paid under marketing agreements in respect of such commodity or under nonpremium insurance agreements in respect of such commodity as hereinafter provided. Upon the basis of such estimates there shall be from time to time determined, and if such estimates are concurred in by a majority of the advisory council for such commodity, the board shall publish the amount of the equalization fee (if any is required under such estimates) for each unit of weight, measure, or value designated by the board, to be collected upon such unit of such agricultural commodity during any part of the marketing period for the commodity. Such amount is referred to in this act as the "equalization fee." At the time of determining and publishing any equalization fee the board shall specify the time during which the particular fee shall remain in effect and the place and manner of its payment and collection.

(c) Under such regulations as the board may prescribe, any equalization fee so published by the board shall be paid, in respect of each marketed unit of such commodity, upon one of the following: The transportation, processing, or sale of such unit. The equalization fee shall not be collected more than once in respect of any unit. The board shall determine, in the case of each class of transactions in the commodity, whether the equalization fee shall be paid upon transportation, processing, or sale. The board shall make such determination upon the basis of the most effective and economical means of collecting the fee with respect to each unit of the commodity marketed during the marketing period.

(d) The board may by regulation require any person engaged in the transportation, processing, or acquisition by purchase of any agricultural commodity—

(1) To file returns under oath and to report, in respect of his transportation, processing, or acquisition of such commodity, the amount of equalization fees payable thereon, and such other facts as may be necessary for their payment or collection.

(2) To collect the equalization fee as directed by the board and to account therefor.

(e) The board, under regulations prescribed by it, is authorized to pay to any such person required to collect such fees a reasonable charge for his services.

(f) Every person who, in violation of the regulations prescribed by the board, fails to collect or account for any equalization fee shall be liable for its amount and to a penalty equal to one-half its amount. Such amount and penalty may be recovered together in a civil suit brought by the board in the name of the United States.

(g) As used in this section—

(1) In the case of grain the term "processing" means milling of grain for market or the first processing in any manner for market (other than cleaning or drying) of grain not so milled, and the term "sale" means a sale or other disposition in the United States of grain for milling or other processing for market, for resale, or for delivery by a common carrier—occurring during a marketing period in respect of grain.

(2) In the case of cotton the term "processing" means spinning, milling, or any manufacturing of cotton other than ginning; the term "sale" means a sale or other disposition in the United States of cotton for spinning, milling, or any manufacturing other than ginning, or for delivery outside the United States; and the term "transportation" means the acceptance of cotton by a common carrier for delivery to any person for spinning, milling, or any manufacturing of cotton other than ginning, or for delivery outside the United States—occurring during a marketing period in respect of cotton.

(3) In the case of livestock the term "processing" means slaughter for market by a purchaser of livestock, and the term "sale" means a sale or other disposition in the United States of livestock destined for slaughter for market without intervening holding for feeding (other than feeding in transit) or fattening—occurring during a marketing period in respect of livestock.

(4) In the case of tobacco, the term "sale" means a sale or other disposition to any dealer in leaf tobacco or to any registered manufacurer of the products of tobacco. The term "tobacco" means leaf tobacco, stemmed or unstemmed.

(5) In the case of grain, livestock, and tobacco, the term "transportation" means the acceptance of a commodity by a common carrier for delivery.

(6) In the case of any agricultural commodity other than grain, cotton, livestock, or tobacco, the board shall, in connection with its specification of the place and manner of payment and collection of the equalization fee, further specify the particular type of processing, sale, or transportation in respect of which the equalization fee is to be paid and collected.

(7) The term "sale" does not include a transfer to a cooperative association for the purpose of sale or other disposition by such association on account of the transferor; nor a transfer of title in pursuance of a contract entered into before, and at a specified price determined before, the commencement of a marketing period in respect of the agricultural commodity. In case of the transfer of title in pursuance of a contract entered into after the commencement of a marketing period in respect of the agricultural commodity, but entered into at a time when, and at a specified price determined at a time during which a particular equalization fee is in effect, then the equalization fee applicable in respect of such transfer of title shall be the equalization fee in effect at the time when such specified price was determined.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, this amendment seeks to strike out the paragraph containing the equalization fee. I am very anxious to vote for the bill, but I can not bring myself at present to vote for the equalization fee, imposing what, I think, would be a tax upon the producer outside the powers of Congress.

I take that position, first, because during the debate on the bill yesterday we increased the amount of the revolving fund from $250,000,000 to $400,000,000. In the second place, the purpose of the equalization fee, as shown in the beginning of section 8, is to carry out the marketing and insurance agreements in respect to agricultural commodities without loss to the revolving fund.

If that is the purpose of putting in the equalization fee, after all the other methods of arriving at this protection of the farmer have been carried through and found unavailable, then I would prefer to draw upon the amount of the revolving fund of $400,000,000, and let the Government pay it, than to put this charge upon the producer, which I believe the Congress has no right to put there.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SACKETT. The Senator will yield, but the Senator will yield the floor, simply asking for a vote upon his amendment.

Mr. McMASTER. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SACKETT. I will.

Mr. McMASTER. In view of the fact that the Senator's amendment strikes out the equalization fee, is not his amendment right in line with the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART]?

Mr. SACKETT. I think probably it is, but I told the Senator from Iowa that I would offer the amendment, and he agreed to it.

Mr. McMASTER. The two amendments are practically the same?

Mr. SACKETT. Practically the same. What I want to have is a vote upon this amendment. I appreciate that if the amendment should carry, it will necessitate certain minor amendments to make the bill conform, in the matter of paragraphs, and so forth, but it simply raises the question of whether we are to put an equalization fee, as a matter of last resort, upon the producers of any of these commodities, or whether we are going to allow the revolving fund, which we have now put at $400,000,000, take care of these losses. I ask for a record vote.

Mr. DILL. I want to ask the Senator from Kentucky a question, because I have not been able to hear all he said. I wish to know whether my understanding is correct or not, namely, that this amendment strikes out the equalization fee?

Mr. SACKETT. Yes.

Mr. DILL. That is the purpose of the amendment?

Mr. SACKETT. That is the purpose of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. SACKETT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the Senate has chosen to retain in the bill the provision that permits the board to deal and dicker with the packers, the millers, the cotton brokers, and all other dealers in farm products, in effect permitting them to suffer no loss. In case they organize their subsidiaries outside the United States to buy these surplus commodities at the world price, on the world market, exactly the same private interests, the same private parties are involved, and they are given this opportunity to engage in business with the board, to purchase the commodities of the farm. The same interests will be permitted, through their subsidiaries, to buy cheap products outside of America, and tax the farmer an equalization fee to make up the difference. Under such circumstances, I submit that the equalization fee ought to go out of this bill. Had the amendment which I proposed been adopted, there would have been an harmonious arrangement for cooperative marketing among the farmers and by the farmers. With that amendment defeated, you have the lamb and the lion lying down together, and it is the millers and the packers and the cotton brokers and other dealers in farm commodities that will be the lion, and the farmer must accept the loss; he will be devoured speaking in terms of his economic status.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. I want to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question, because I have been seeking light on the subject for some time. How does this equalization fee tax the farmer, or constitute any burden on the farmer? He does not get the equalization fee; he does not expect to get it. When a price is fixed under the provisions of this bill, it is simply put up to a sufficient point to cover a proper price for the farmer and to cover the equalization fee besides. So how is it any burden on the farmer? How is it any tax on the farmer?

Mr. BLAINE. I must leave the answer to that question to those who propose to sell the farmers' commodities to the millers and the packers and the cotton brokers as to who is going to pay the equalization fee.

Mr. BRUCE. Do not leave it to anybody, because you will never find anybody who can answer it.

Mr. BLAINE. With the equalization fee and the plan of cooperation devised, this bill might have been of great benefit to the agricultural workers of this country; but when there has been engrafted into the measure these other private agencies, whose profits are in effect guaranteed by the equalization fee, no matter who pays it, whether it is the farmer or the consumer, it will be of no benefit to the farmer. The theory is that the farmer pays the equalization fee, because it has been stated that those who do not belong to the cooperative organization should not receive the benefits of that which flows from cooperation, and therefore they should be taxed in order that all farmers alike may share in this cooperative marketing of their commodities. That is the theory, and that has been the burden of the debate on this floor in the last several days. I have endeavored to follow that debate, and as I followed it I was led to an investigation of the provision that was retained in this bill but a few moments ago on a record vote. With that provision in the bill the equalization fee ought to go out, for I am opposed to any scheme or system that will protect the profits of the packers, the millers, the cotton brokers, and those who are to-day in control of the markets of farm commodities at the expense of the farmer through an equalization fee. That is why I shall vote for the elimination of the equalization fee.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, this is not a packer's bill, or a cotton exchange bill, or a miller's bill. This is the fruit of the hard work of the representatives of agriculture, after more than five years' labor, during which hearings have been held for months at a time. It is not any fly-by-night matter that has been arrived at hastily, or anything of the kind. No bill in Congress in many years that I know of has had the serious consideration that this measure has had. Representatives of agriculture from every part of the country have come to Washington and given evidence and suggestions in regard to this measure. Every farm organization in America has indorsed it. It is true, the National Grange would prefer a debenture plan, but they are not opposed to this, and I am sure they want it passed, unless they can have their debenture plan.

So, Mr. President, it is a late hour to kick over what it seems to me is an honest effort on the part of agriculture, and not packers, or millers, or anybody else.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

Mr. GOODING. I am not going to be interrupted in the course of my remarks.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the Senator answer a question when he is through?

Mr. GOODING. Yes; I will answer a question now, if it is just a question.

Mr. BLAINE. That is all I want to ask.

Mr. GOODING. I want to take up the story of the wheat growers, because that is about the story of agriculture.

Mr. BLAINE. Were the farmers who belonged to these farm organizations advised about the board having the right to enter into agreements with the packers and the millers and the cotton brokers?

Mr. GOODING. There is no doubt about it. I would not say all the farmers, but the organizations. This is not a new bill. This bill was submitted to the Senate on two different occasions, and to the whole country, and the same provisions were in it with regard to using the instrumentalities that we now have for marketing farm products, which should not be destroyed until something better, if possible, was put in their place. Nobody should want to do that. I expect that the President, if he signs this bill, will appoint a board of commissioners who are intelligent men, who will be able to do business even with packers and not be robbed. I am inclined to think it would be a good thing for the producers if they had some way to get up a little closer to the packers and to the millers. That will not hurt. If we can pick the best brains in agriculture and put them up against the big organizations of the country, they will work out the problems in a way that will be beneficial, and the farmers will not be robbed.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOODING. Yes; I yield.

Mr. FESS. I would not object to making a contract with the packers to handle it if it were not for this fact: That the packers would have no risk whatever to run, because the losses would be made up; but if the packers were a cooperative association of farmers, so that the product would be handled by the people who raised it, there would be a reason for lessening the losses. In this case there is no reason whatever.

Mr. GOODING. The packers are the only instrumentality through which we can market the pork products at the present time in foreign countries, and pretty much in our own country, and they must be utilized, they must be used, and the Senator well knows it. His vote generally on this bill is to destroy it, and not to be helpful. There is no doubt about that. I understand the Senator, who is to make the keynote speech at Kansas City, very thoroughly, and he will not make a keynote speech for the farmers when he arrives there. If we are going to talk plain, let us talk plain, and lay everything on the table, and get at it.

Mr. FESS. When the Senator makes any speech for the farmers, he will go to a farmer, and not to a Senator.

Mr. GOODING. Not to the Senator's kind of a Senator, not a professor of economics. I never yet knew one of them who was right when it came to farm problems. They have the corporation view, as a rule.

Mr. FESS. In this case the Senator from Idaho has the corporation view.

Mr. GOODING. I am not going to yield any longer to the Senator.

Mr. FESS. No; the Senator speaks for the packers instead of the farmers.

Mr. GOODING. I want to go on and tell the story of the wheat grower and show what he has suffered. In 1923 the Government made an investigation of the cost of growing wheat in four of the Northwestern States—North and South Dakota, Minnesota, and Montana. Not taking any depreciation of soil into consideration, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] would have us do in his bill, not taking any depreciation of buildings, livestock, farm implements, or anything else, but allowing him a bare 6 per cent, which does not cover his costs and interests, it was found that the actual cost of producing a bushel of wheat was $1.40. In Canada it was 92 cents.

I am quite sure I am safe in saying that the cost of wheat in 1921 and 1922 was about the same as it was in 1923 and years following. The average price per bushel of wheat on the farm in 1921 was $1.01. He lost that year, on the actual cost of production as found by the Government, $314,000,000. I shall give only the round numbers. In 1922 the average price on the farm was 98 cents a bushel, and that year he lost $364,000,000. In 1923 the price was 92 cents a bushel, and that year he lost $380,000,000. In 1924 the average price on the farm was $1.27, and that year he lost $101,000,000. In 1925 his wheat was worth on the farm $1.45 a bushel, and that year he had a profit of $30,000,000. In 1926 he lost $166,000,000, and in 1927 he lost $160,000,000.

In the seven years the wheat grower actually lost, according to Government statistics gathered as to the price of wheat on the farm and the selling price on the farm, $1,487,910,230. That was his actual loss. He can not continue that indefinitely. We must enact some legislation that will give him somewhere near the cost of production, and that is what the equalization fee in the pending bill proposes to do. Without the equalization fee I would consider it a most dangerous measure. I think any bill that appropriates money to loan to the farmer, unless we can give him an increased price, is a dangerous thing for the American farmer.

What the American farmer must have, if he is to be prosperous in this country, is an increased price to meet the increased cost which has been forced upon him by his own Government through legislation, and there is no question of doubt about it. We changed, through legislation, the basis of a day's labor upon the railroads from a 10-hour day to an 8-hour day. We increased the freight rates almost 100 per cent by legislation. Through legislation we increased the price of labor on the railroads 100 per cent. That was followed by an increase in practically every industry in America, and the farmer is paying these increases of 100 per cent for everything he buys for the home and the farm and yet he can pass no part of it on to his consumer. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] understands that. The farmer never made a price on anything. He must look in the papers every morning to find the prices on farm products.

The equalization fee gives the farmer an opportunity to pass on some of these increases. The bill creates a board of directors for the farmer and for each commodity there will be an advisory council of seven members to advise the board of directors as to the best interests of that particular commodity. Talk about organizing the American farmer! We might as well try to go out and organize the west wind on the prairies as to try to organize 6,500,000 farmers scattered through the 48 different States in the Union. It is an impossible task.

The farmer has been struggling with that problem for years. He has had his cooperative organizations, only to see them broken down and destroyed by the farmers themselves who were not willing to cooperate. I had the misfortune to belong to two marketing organizations, one a wheat organization and the other a wool organization. They were absolutely destroyed practically by the producers of those particular commodities because they would not come in and cooperate. Some of them did not try to cooperate. They considered it smart, apparently, to let somebody else do the work and they reap the benefit, with the result that they broke down the market every time. We will have a board of directors here which will stabilize the market and will take the surplus off the market in an orderly way.

Let me tell what happens to the farmer. The average production of wheat in America is about 800,000,000 bushels per year. We export 200,000,000 bushels a year. That is about the average export, and I am going to take the average. I will take round figures, because they will be easier for me to explain in relation to the benefit of the equalization fee as it will be put in force by the board.

In my State for the last two years the price of wheat to the farmer has averaged $1 a bushel, and I am going to take $1 a bushel, because that is a round number. What the bill proposes to do is to increase the price of wheat by the amount of the tariff, 42 cents per bushel. Wheat in my State is worth a dollar per bushel for export into foreign markets. That means, for the 200,000,000 bushels of wheat that will be exported and taken off the market to export, that the board will lose $84,000,000; but in order to make up that loss they will levy an equalization fee of 12 cents a bushel, which will raise $96,000,000, or $12,000,000 more than the loss in the sale of the 200,000,000 bushels of wheat on the foreign market. This means that the farmer will have left 30 cents a bushel, because he is able to take off from this market the surplus and sell it abroad and bring the price of wheat up to the world price plus the tariff. He can not get the 42 cents, but he can get the 30 cents, which means in round numbers that the farmer will make, off of his crop of 800,000,000 bushels, $240,000,000. In other words, instead of selling his wheat for $1 per bushel in Idaho, if this bill passes with its equalization fee he will receive $1.30 per bushel, and even that does not bring him within 10 cents of the actual cost of production as found by his Government that he is entitled to. Surely everybody ought to be willing to give any producer or any manufacturer the cost of production. There is something wrong in any man's system when he is not willing to give at least that much.

Some of the enemies of the bill are very much alarmed about the farmer having an overproduction.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOODING. Certainly.

Mr. NORBECK. It is an interesting question when the Senator speaks of the "enemies" of the bill. This seems to be a case where we have to contend with the real conservative and the real radicals joining against the farmer. We have not only got to fight Boston on this bill, but we have to fight BROOKHART. I have been a progressive for a good many years, but I have come to believe that the more radical a progressive becomes, the more liable he is to join the enemy.

Mr. GOODING. The Senator's remarks are appropriate. Of course there are some people who, if they can not have what they want, do not want anybody else to have anything. Of course I would not apply that to Senators, but there are such people outside of the Senate, as we all know.

I am sure that the biggest factor in the bill is that it will bring about an orderly production. To my mind that is the big feature of the bill, because I do not believe there is much prosperity for anybody who continues all the time to produce great surpluses. After all, I do not care whether it is the tariff or whether it is the equalization fee or what it is, the great law of supply and demand must control and will control. The farmer understands this, and to my mind there is no danger of an increased production of wheat.

But if the farmer should produce 1,000,000,000 bushels of wheat and export 400,000,000 bushels of wheat, in order to take care of the 42-cent loss in the export of the 400,000,000 bushels of wheat, or $168,000,000, the board would have to levy an equalization fee of 18 cents a bushel.

The 18 cents a bushel would raise $180,000,000, exactly $12,000,000 more than we say his losses are. Still that gives him 24 cents a bushel more than the world's price. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] is quite right. After all it does not come out of the farmer's pocket. It never was in his pocket. But because we take out of his bushel of wheat 18 cents, even if he produces 1,000,000,000 bushels of wheat he will have 24 cents more per bushel. That will give him in round numbers on a billion bushels 24 cents a bushel or $240,000,000, and yet, if you please, he is 16 cents away from the actual cost of production shown by his own Government, and yet we find men fighting him.

That is what the equalization fee will do for the wheat grower. It will do just as much for every other farm product. To my mind it will do more for the cotton grower. It will make it possible for him to market his farm product in an orderly way, and that is what the world is doing with all its raw materials, and no place has there been a failure. There have been some changes in the system. The coffee bankers in Brazil are carrying that product along. England brought her rubber from 7 cents to a dollar a pound, which is entirely too high and we all agree to that, but to-day the rubber plantations are prosperous.

I am satisfied that the cotton growers, with an advisory council of seven members taken from among the cotton growers, can adopt a plan and a policy that will bring about a reasonable and fair price for cotton every year, instead of selling it below the cost of production as they are doing at the present time, not only in America but for the whole world.

Mr. President, Senators say they are going to vote against the bill if the equalization fee is left in it. I am going to vote against it if it is taken out and every friend of agriculture who knows anything about the needs of agriculture ought to do the same thing.

Mr. NORBECK. There is nothing else to do. If the equalization fee is taken out, it becomes a joke and we ought to be honest with the people and vote against the bill.

Mr. GOODING. Of course, that is correct. There is not a farm organization in America asking for the bill without the equalization fee; not one. Of course, the packers are against the bill and the millers are against it. The millers have the best organization there is in America. Is there any doubt in the mind of any Senator that with $1.06 of compensatory duty on 100 pounds of flour, because there is a duty of 42 cents on a bushel of wheat, that the miller is not collecting the full duty on flour and that the people are paying for it? Of course, a man would be simple if he did not know that was going on.

Yet the farmer gets no benefit of the protection of 42 cents per bushel on wheat, with the exception of what is called the hard wheat, of which we produce around 200,000,000 bushels. On an average he has had a benefit of about 12 cents per bushel out of the 42 cents per bushel on the hard wheat; but out of 600,000,000 bushels of what is called soft wheat farmers never received any benefit of the tariff of 42 cents per bushel. At times millers and speculators have forced it below the price it is actually worth for export, and yet the people pay and pay all the time the full amount of duty on wheat of 42 cents per bushel.

The bakers to-day are getting $27 out of a barrel of flour, while the farmers are getting less than $5 out of a barrel of flour.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Idaho a question?

Mr. GOODING. Yes.

Mr. BRUCE. Is it not true that the function of distribution as well as the function of production is necessarily attended with great cost?

Mr. GOODING. That is true, of course, I will say to the Senator from Maryland. I think, however, it has been stated on this floor over and over again, and I have stated it, that we have 19,000,000 people trafficking in farm products, and for every dollar the farmer gets those 19,000,000 people take $2. There is in this country a farm population of 36,000,000 and that is the division of rewards.

To my mind the pending bill is going to bring about cheaper living when the instrumentalities are properly built up for marketing, but it is going to take a little time to do that.

Mr. BRUCE. But the point I am making is that a certain amount of cost and expense is inseparable from the distribution of agricultural products.

Mr. GOODING. Of course.

Mr. BRUCE. And that cost has got to be met by somebody.

Mr. GOODING. Certainly.

Mr. BRUCE. And if it is not met by private individuals or private concerns it has to be met by the Government. Is not that so?

Mr. GOODING. It is not met by the Government.

Mr. BRUCE. But agricultural products can not be distributed without expense.

Mr. GOODING. Of course, the freight and all other expenses have to be paid.

Mr. BRUCE. Then somebody has got to be paid for handling the products. That is one of the offices connected with the function of distribution.

Mr. GOODING. For every hundred people in America there is a storekeeper. So it goes on down through the list. We in America have the most extravagant marketing system the world has ever seen. It is getting more expensive all the time. I think much of it can be eliminated by the passage of this bill. With this board of directors—that is all they are—the cotton growers are going to be stockholders so far as their work in cotton marketing is concerned; the wheat growers are going to be stockholders, so far as their part is concerned in the production of wheat; and so it goes on through the whole system. This bill means that we are going to develop in this country an organization that will permit the farmers to market their product the same as other industries market their products to-day.

The tariff legislation, as the Senator from Maryland knows, permits the manufacturers of this country to sell cheaper abroad than they do at home. That is all the farmer is asking for. In this case he is asking for an American price for American cost of production that has been forced on him by his own Government; that is all. The farmer does not want anything else, and he can not get even that under this bill. Nobody can be hurt; there is no way that the farmer can inflate the price beyond a reasonable one, because the tariff will not permit him to do it. We had just as well understand it. I speak only for myself. This fight is going to continue. If the Supreme Court shall find the proposed legislation unconstitutional, the farmers of the country will be forced to make an effort to amend the Constitution, so that they, as well as corporations, may come under the Constitution. I have listened before the Interstate Commerce Committee to an argument on constitutionality in respect to coal. We had two sets of attorneys before us—one representing the American Mine Workers and the other the mine operators. Both of them have been on both sides of the question. First the operators, when the strike was called in the coal mines, took the position in the coal fields of Pennsylvania and West Virginia that the mining of coal was interstate commerce and asked for injunctions against the striking miners because it was claimed the strike interfered with the mining of coal. Now the operators refuse to give the Interstate Commerce Committee the cost of production saying that coal is not interstate commerce and that the committee for that reason has no right to ask the question.

The United Mine Workers took the position before the courts that the mining of coal was not interstate commerce, and for that reason the injunctions should not issue; but the courts issued their injunctions and now attorneys for the United Mine Workers insist that the mining of coal is interstate commerce and from the injunctions that have been granted in Pennsylvania, I am sure they have the right to believe that the mining of coal is interstate commerce, for in Pennsylvania they have obtained injunctions against the miners singing Nearer, My God, to Thee, and other hymns because coal is interstate commerce according to the decision of that court.

I have confidence in the Supreme Court; I believe they will find that wheat is interstate commerce; that it is a part of the great traffic that passes over our railroads; that it enters as a large factor into making up the interstate commerce of the country; and that we have a right to deal with it as interstate commerce, under the Constitution. That is what this bill proposes to do; that is all and nothing else. It merely proposes to permit the farmers of the country to transact business the same as the great corporations of the country do, and that everybody ought to be willing to give the farmer an opportunity to do.

The people of New England, on whom we have piled protection for more than a hundred years, have built up great industries, all of which have increased the cost of the production of a bushel of wheat; but, to my mind, the protective tariff is a great American principle; I think it has built up a high standard of citizenship in America; and I am not for breaking it down. Ah, but they give to the poor old farmer what? Nothing at all. They give to the West what? Nothing at all. They are against his good roads; they are against anything in the interest of agriculture or the West. We had just as well begin to call a spade a spade and have an understanding. Do not forget that "whom the gods would destrcy they first make mad."

No wonder there is discontent in the ranks of agriculture. Would Senators expect to find among the farmers anything but discontent? We have not been fair with them; the Government has not been honest with the farmer. When a Government changes the basis of a day's labor from 10 hours to 8 hours a day, increases the price of labor 100 per cent, increases the freight rates which the railroads pass on to the consumer, and then pays no attention to the farmer whose cost of production has been increased 100 per cent, I maintain that is a crime. Perhaps it was not intentional, but that is just what has happened to the American farmer, and that is what is the matter with him.

New England is not fair to the West. They insist that we go back to normalcy. I have heard much about the word "normalcy." It means, according to my opinion, breaking down the price of labor, to what it was before the war. Mr. President, I hope that will never happen. I do not believe American labor is getting any too much for the work performed, and I hope the time will come when we shall be able to pay more, because I believe that to-day in organized labor and in other forms of labor rests the safety of the American Government and its best interests. It is strange, is it not, that the man who belongs to a labor organization and buys a loaf of bread is on record with his coworkers for this bill, while the manufacturers of the East into whose pockets the Government has poured billions are opposing it almost to a man. Come on with the fight. I want to tell you, Mr. President, the American farmer is ready for it with his back to the wall; that he has reached the point where he is about ready to let the tail go with the hide.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I think all Senators with whom I have served will agree that my record since I have been in the Senate has been favorable to agriculture whether it be of the West or North or South. No Senator has worked harder for the farmers at all times than I have. I know that the farmers need help, and I am anxious to help them, but I can not understand how putting a tax under the guise of an equalization fee will help the farmer. I do not believe we have the right to put an equalization fee on the farmer, and I will never vote for this bill unless it is amended to strike out this fee or else allow the farmers to decide whether this fee is wise. It must be left entirely in the control of the farmers. I shall never vote to put the farmers in a straight jacket—they have hard enough times as it is without adding any burdens to their already too heavy load. We know that under the protective tariff the manufacturers by the help of Congress have been benefited at the expense of the public, who are taxed to pay for it. We know that the railroads under the Esch-Cummins law have been practically guaranteed dividends on all their property; and we know that railroad labor under the Adamson law has been benefited. Furthermore, we know that the Post Office Department suffers a loss of practically $100,000,000 a year in carrying postal matter for certain interests that do not pay the cost of carrying it. Then why should not the Government pay any loss sustained in handling surplus cotton and other farm products?

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. SACKETT] offers an amendment which provides that if there shall be any loss in handling the surplus cotton or other agricultural products it shall come out of the fund to be created by Congress, and I shall vote for his amendment. Some of my friends on the other side of the Chamber want to make the farmer pay this loss. They want to help the farmer by taxing him under the guise of an equalization fee, which is a mighty poor way to help him.

Mr. President, we have heard a great deal said on the other side this afternoon about what the farmers in America want. No Senator keeps more closely in touch with the farmers' needs than I do, and I am sure the Georgia farmers want me to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, which would relieve them of paying this equalization fee, and provides that the losses shall be paid out of the Government fund to be created for handling cotton and other surplus crops. Congress has already delayed too long the help that is necessary for the farmers to make a living. We must do something now. When we help the farmers it benefits all classes. No matter what Senators may say, it can not be denied that Congress has failed in its duty by the farmers. Many thousand farmers, during the past few years, have worked hard and through no fault of their own have either lost their farms or have them heavily mortgaged.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I can agree with a great many things said by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING]. I know that the farmer needs relief. The question is what manner of relief should we give him. We ought not to give him a gold brick; we ought to give him legislation that will reach the evil, legislation that will help him out of the difficulty in which he finds himself. But I can not understand why a packer should be tied into this bill at any place, in any fashion, to share the fund that is to be raised by the farmers by an equalization fee.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. Will the Senator turn to the place in the bill where it refers to the packer or where the packer is "tied in"?

Mr. HEFLIN. I understand the Senator from Oregon has said that in certain circumstances the services of the packer would be used, and therefore he would share in this fund.

Mr. McNARY. He would not share in the fund, but he would be paid for his services. If there are agencies in existence by which hogs can be handled or a portion of a carcass, or by which wheat can be ground into flour, the board has a right to employ such agencies to render the service, the same as we might employ an automobile to take us from here to the center of the town. The bill does not confer any kind of emolument whatsoever on the packer, but if he renders a service, just as a cooperative organization renders a service, he gets the price of the service so rendered. Would the Senator do less? If two or more cooperative associations are employed by the board—because the board has not any instrumentality of its own—the board pays the actual cost and charges of the services rendered by such cooperatives. There are no agencies created, aside from the board and advisory councils, save those that are now constituted and recognized as lawful agencies. The board will pay such agencies for the services rendered. Would the Senator decline such service and deny compensation? That is all there is in this proposition. It makes it possible for the farmers under all conditions and circumstances to take advantage of the machinery created by this bill. Would the Senator deny them that opportunity? Would he expect anyone under the sun, whether it be a packer, a cooperative association, or a Senator of the United States, to render a service without emolument and fair compensation? If the Senator does, then he represents a school of thought of which I am not at all a disciple.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator suggests that the packer is merely to act as an agent. I can not bring myself to appreciate the situation where the miller, a buyer, is going to help the seller handle his wheat in such a way as to enhance the value of wheat and cause him to have to pay a higher price for it.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator. I want to get at the facts.

Mr. McNARY. The language is so plain and the illustration I have drawn I think so accurate that it seems unnecessary to say more about it; but let me ask the Senator a question on the miller proposition.

The board sees that it is necessary in its physical, raw state to withdraw from sale a large quantity of wheat. It finds that to employ American labor it should and could be milled in American mills. It has the right to enter into contracts to have that conversion take place, in the interest of American labor. Does the Senator object to the employment of American labor?

Mr. HEFLIN. No.

Mr. McNARY. Or would he have the wheat in its natural state sent over to Europe, to be ground by the employment of foreign labor?

Mr. HEFLIN. No.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator has talked very eloquently and sincerely—I give him credit for that—about how much interested he is in America and the American citizen. All that this provision with regard to conversion is for is to give to American labor—100 per cent American labor, I assume—that works in the mills the wages that otherwise would flow with the unconverted wheat into Europe, to be there ground by foreigners.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is a very pretty picture, Mr. President.

Mr. McNARY. It is a true one. I am sorry the Senator did not paint it, because it would be more glowing.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I paid very strict attention to the Senator, and his statement of the matter was very clear and strong; but the idea of the miller working in concert with the producer is a thing that puzzles me. The buyer has his own position, and the seller has his. They are at war with each other, in a sense. The buyer wants to buy just as cheaply as possible. The seller wants to sell for the best price possible. The thought that came to me was, how are you going to handle this situation with a miller or a packer who is on the buying side of this question, and tie him into a situation where he is going to represent the seller's side of the question and himself, too, at the same time, and make it profitable to both? That is a hard thing to do.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, if my distinguished friend, who is usually a student of measures that come before this body for its consideration, would read the bill comprehensively and studiously, he would see that the instrumentality—it may be a packer—buys at the suggestion of the board and sells under marketing agreements, and simply receives a small compensation or a fair compensation for the service it renders.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I can understand, if an occasion should arise where there is not an agency that could be employed, that it might be necessary to employ the miller; but when you employ the miller he has to be a queer miller indeed to be looking out for his side and his profits in the trade, and at the same time using his influence and his sense and his strength to look after the interests and the welfare of the producer in the trade.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. GOODING. I want to say to the Senator that there is more than one miller; and if he does not treat the board fairly and honestly, they will not transact business with him.

Here is a board of directors of intelligent men, beyond a doubt. If the President signs this bill, of course he is going to exercise great care in the selection of the men. He will want it to be successful.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. GOODING. Of course there is nothing else to do except to use the instrumentalities that are in existence until you can build up something better.

Mr. HEFLIN. Well, it is a hard situation to put the farmer in to use an agency like this, when you could create one of his own making, and let the farmer look after his own business.

If I understand this—and I want to get it clear in my mind—the miller will pay no part of any equalization fee. The packer will pay no equalization fee.

Mr. GOODING. Let me explain it to the Senator.

Mr. HEFLIN. In a moment. The farmer pays the equalization fee; and yet you will call in a miller, an outside man, or a packer, and he is going to share in this equalization fee plucked out of the purse of the farmer. It looks to me as though we are going a long distance out of the way when we go off and pull in these outside influences, who naturally are antagonistic to the farmer and to good prices for the farmer's product.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GOODING. This is what the board will do:

The miller will not export wheat. It is not necessary to use him to export wheat, but he of necessity exports flour; and, because of the American price of wheat being increased, he must be protected in the increased price of his flour, and that is all this board will do. That is all they propose to do—to protect him, to see that he does not have a loss on his flour, because the price has been increased to the American farmer—that is all; nothing more. He does not share in any profits. He gets his profits from milling, and that ends it.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. If that is true, then his agency is not worth anything to the farmer.

Mr. GOODING. Oh, yes. He grinds the wheat into flour, and we export every year a great many hundred thousand barrels of wheat in the shape of flour.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does he then, by that act, increase the price of wheat?

Mr. GOODING. Well, of course by the action of the board in taking the surplus of wheat off the market, and permitting the great law of supply and demand to operate, you can raise it up to the tariff. If it does not do that, then all the arguments that you have made on the other side of the Chamber in the past that the tariff increases the price of everything in this country have been wrong. Of course it will increase it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then what he does, does help to raise the price of wheat?

Mr. GOODING. Yes; but he does not share in the increase.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then, if that is true, he has to turn right around and pay more for the wheat that he buys next day.

Mr. GOODING. Of course; and he ought to pay more, because he is not paying the cost of production.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does the Senator think he would do that out of his affection for the farmer?

Mr. GOODING. Oh, not at all.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does the Senator think he would go to work to raise the price to himself out of regard for the farmer?

Mr. GOODING. Not at all; no. We are not anticipating any affection at all. This is a cold-blooded business proposition. He will have to pay the American price for wheat; that is all; and unless the farmer can get that out of his farm products, he has not got much.

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to help him to get the cost of production——

Mr. GOODING. Then vote for this bill.

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to help him get the cost of production, plus a splendid profit; but I do not propose to have tied into it packers and millers, who will get this fund instead of the farmer. I have seen that done before with legislation in the name of the farmer; and, when it was over, somebody else had access to the fund who had better collateral than he had. The packer is one of them, and the miller is another. They get it, and he does not get it.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I simply want to ask the Senator from Alabama whether he is not mistaken in saying that this equalization fee is plucked—I use his very language—from the pocket of the farmer. That is not the way the bill works. The way it works, if I understand it, is this:

The farm board will proceed to create enough scarcity in a particular commodity, by buying up large amounts of it for export, to send the domestic price for it up to a point sufficient not only to cover what might be conceived to be the proper price that the farmer should receive, but to cover the equalization fee besides. In other words, the equalization fee is no tax or burden on the farmer. It is a tax or burden on the ultimate consumer alone. It would never reach the pocket of the farmer. The farmer would never expect it to reach his pocket. It is just a part of the bubble blown up by the inflation of price, that the farm board is to bring about by buying up exportable surpluses.

I repeat, and nobody has been able to challenge the accuracy of the statement so far, that the equalization fee is in no true—in no real sense—any tax or burden on the farmer at all. The farm board has to incur certain expenses in its marketing operations, and the bill proposes just two means by which those expenses may be met. One is by creating this equalization fund, which is created, of course, by merely pushing the price up higher than is necessary to give the farmer a proper price for his product. The other is by making advances and loans out of the Federal Treasury to farmers' cooperatives. In other words, in one case the Government takes the sum that is necessary to meet the expenses out of the pockets of the consumers, and in the other it takes it out of the General Treasury of the Federal Government.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am in favor of aiding the farmer in any way I can to keep his surplus off the market. There is his trouble. If this thing would work, and I knew it would work, I would favor it; but a situation might arise where it would not work.

Suppose they assessed the farmers of my section $5 a bale on cotton. The farmer who produces 10 bales would be assessed $50. If the equalization fee did not work as they thought it would, and the market should continue to go down, he is hurt not only the $50 taken from him in the outset but in the further decline of the price. The same thing might occur with wheat or corn. But, Mr. President, what the farmer needs to have done is to be delivered from the money sharks of the country who feed on his substance, who organize and watch him when he comes to the market place with his produce. They commence to hammer the price down. They go upon the grain exchange, and they sell fictitious grain to the extent of billions of bushels, and they beat down the price.

Here is the farmer coming to the market place with his grain. When he gets there they have swamped the market with their fictitious sales on the exchange. They have controlled the price; they beat it down; they are ready to buy from the producer, and what does he find? He finds himself in a market place where the price does not justify him in selling, but he has to sell. Why? The merchant that he owes tells him he must sell; he needs his money. The banker from whom he has borrowed tells him he had better sell. If they can beat down the price to-day, they can do it to-morrow; and, demoralized, he stands in the market place helpless. He has to dump his wheat on the market, and when they buy it they turn right around on the same exchange and speculate on the bull side of the market, and put up the price rapidly until it goes sky-high, and they clean up millions of money as it goes down, and millions of money as it goes up; and then they put the price of flour to the consumer at the high price fixed by the speculators on the exchange.

They do the same thing in cotton. The farmer comes to the market place. They beat down the price of cotton $15 or $20 a bale, perhaps, and he has to sell. The merchant needs his money; the banker wants his paper settled; and the farmer has pressure brought to bear on him all around. What he needs to do, what the grain grower needs to do is to be able to keep his cotton or his grain off the market, and tell the buying world, "You can not have this grain or this cotton unless you pay me the cost of production, plus a profit. I have a right to that as a producer. We produce that which feeds and clothes the world. We are not going to permit you to rob us, and send us out of the market places in America empty handed back home with nothing for our wives and children."

Senators, that thing has got to stop. The farmer has got to be delivered.

Now, here is another trouble that the farmer has.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HEFLIN. In a moment.

The banker may be speculating on the bear side of cotton. The banker may be speculating on the bear side of wheat or corn. He does not want to loan money to a man to hold his grain off the market when he is making money by the price going down in his speculation, so he discourages him, and does not let him have the loan, so he has to sell, and when the farmer dumps his grain on the market it goes still lower, and the banker makes more money out of it. The banker, if he were out entirely and did not speculate in grain or cotton on the bear side he would be interested in loaning money and helping the producer. He lives in the same locality. But the farmer has that situation confronting him.

What will this revolving fund do? I want to say to the Senator from Oregon that that is the redeeming feature of this bill. If we provide $400,000,000 the grain grower can walk up, without consulting anybody who is interested in beating down the price of his stuff, and borrow out of that fund, and hold his product off the market until the price will justify him in selling.

Senators, that is sound doctrine, it is sound principle, it is right. The farmer has the right to be protected in that respect.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STECK in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator will bear with me just a moment, it has been suggested that this provision relating to entering into agreements with other agencies than farmers and cooperative associations would permit the millers and packers to process the farmers' product and manufacture it here at home and give American labor that employment. I want to call to the attention of the Senator, in connection with the remarks made by the Senator from Oregon, the fact that that is not a complete statement of the whole situation, and I will call the attention of the Senate at this time to the provision contained on page 13 of the reprint, which was embodied in my amendment, which I propose to strike out. It reads in this way:

> If the board is of the opinion that there are two or more cooperative associations or corporations created and controlled by one or more such associations capable of carrying out any marketing agreement, the board in entering into the agreement shall not unreasonably discriminate against any such association or corporation in favor of any other such association or corporation. If the board is of the opinion that there is no such cooperative association or corporation created and controlled by one or more such associations capable of carrying out any marketing agreement for purchase, withholding, and disposal, then the board may enter into the agreement with other agencies but shall not unreasonably discriminate between such other agencies.

That provision has nothing to do with the manufacturing or the processing of farm commodities. It is subdivision (f) that deals with food products, or manufactured or processed products. But under the provision which I have just read any miller, any packer, any cotton broker, any of these great institutions, private organizations, may purchase these farm commodities under an agreement which is controlled by this language found on page 12 of the reprint, in paragraph 2, beginning in line 11:

> Any such marketing agreement shall provide for the payment from the stabilization fund for the commodity of the amount of the losses, costs, and charges arising out of the purchase, withholding, and disposal, or out of contracts therefor.

Mr. President, the provision, which was not stricken out, permits the board to enter into these agreements which are controlled by the provisions in section 7 to which I have referred. Therefore, of the equalization fee, which is made compulsory, which is exacted either from the farmers or the consuming public, such part as will be necessary will be paid to the packer, the miller, the cotton broker, or any large corporation with which the board has made a contract for all losses, all costs, all charges, and, in addition to that, the same brokers and millers and packers may have their subsidiary organizations in the British Isles, in France, where they already have them, in Germany, in China, or any place in the world, and those subsidiary agents, made up of the same people, but under a different corporate name, may buy those products, raw or processed, and the losses in the world market upon those products must be made up by the imposition of an equalization fee. If this bill means anything, it means that.

Mr. HEFLIN. It strikes me that the Senator's contention is correct.

Mr. BLAINE. I am putting it just as clearly as I am able to put it. I thank the Senator for permitting the interruption.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. In just a moment, because I want to get through.

Mr. BRUCE. I want to ask the Senator a question before he passes that phase of what he is saying; but if it is not convenient to the Senator to have me interrupt him just now, I will wait.

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. All I wanted to say to the Senator was simply this, that it seems to me he is mistaken in supposing that if this bill goes into effect anybody will do the bulling and the bearing except the Government itself, through this agency, the farm board created by this bill. Of course, it would be in the power of that board to bull or to bear at pleasure as respects a commodity of which there was an exportable surplus. In other words, if it wanted to put the price up, all it would have to do would be to go out in the market, with $400,000,000 behind it, and buy and buy and buy until there was such a scarcity at home of that particular commodity that the price of the commodity would go soaring skyward. Then, of course, the farm board could at any time refrain from creating the state of scarcity in the case of an exportable surplus, which is necessary in order to make this bill effective. So I do not think there would be that opportunity for private speculation of which the Senator speaks. That is the point I want to make. The opportunity to speculate would exist almost entirely as respects the farm board itself.

Mr. HEFLIN. If it could be changed so that the farmer could have the whip hand for a while, I believe I would be willing to have him try it.

Mr. President, I do not get excited over the suggestion that we are about to set aside a fund of $400,000,000 for this purpose, because that money will be used in the interest of the great agricultural classes of America. They have been badly used and much abused in the last few years. The foreclosure of mortgages tells the sad story. Two million farmers have lost their homes in the last six years and have drifted into the cities to start life over again. That is a sad commentary upon this Government and the policies of this administration.

The farmer has fought a losing battle on his farm. The home he once owned, where he was happy with his wife and children, has been taken from him and he has been driven away. I want to make conditions happy and prosperous on the farm again. I want to see the farmer come into his own. I want him to be made a prosperous, upstanding American citizen.

I would remind the Senator from Maryland that during this administration and the one that preceded it Mr. Mellon has refunded to the big taxpayers of America over a billion dollars, without the list and the amounts opposite the names ever having been furnished to the Senate. That money has been refunded to about 150,000 or 200,000 people, while this fund of $400,000,000 is simply to be loaned to the farmers, and it will bless and benefit thirty-odd million farmers—yes; more than that. The agricultural population of the United States is about 65,000,000.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, the Senator misunderstands me, I think. I was not finding any fault with this sum of $400,000,000. I am not prepared to say for a moment that I would not support some thoroughly rational constitutional method on the part of the Government for lending pecuniary aid to the farmers that would involve a loan to the extent of $400,000,000, but what I was especially stressing was the fact that I can not see any reason for creating this equalization fee. Why any provision for an equalization fee should be brought into the bill at all I do not see. It seems to me that the bill would be ever so much more acceptable, that the bill would be ever so much more workable, and the bill would be ever so much more desirable in every respect if no provision were made for an equalization fee at all, but simply related to loans or advances from the Federal Treasury.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator and I are in agreement, in the main, on the equalization fee. I am willing to vote for any sort of a fee the western farmers want. If they are wedded to the idea of an equalization fee on corn and wheat, I will vote for it, if they will strike cotton out of it. But our farmers have not reached the point yet where they are asking me to support an equalization fee on cotton. I will tell Senators they are going a long way when they confer the power upon any organization to reach out and take hold of a farmer who is beyond the pale of the organization and impose a fee upon him to bring in his money to be used in a fund over which the organization has control. That is going a very long way.

I am willing to vote for anything that is sound, that will help the farmer and deliver him out of this awful vortex in which he finds himself to-day, but I believe that the revolving fund that we have provided, which would give the farmers of the South access to probably $150,000,000, would, at the marketing time, enable them to market their cotton in an orderly way, and to keep it off the market when the price did not justify them in selling.

It would have this effect: When the farmer came to market to sell and he felt that the price did not justify him in selling, although he owed money to the merchant and money to the bank, he would say, "I will just put my cotton in the warehouse, I will keep it off the market, I will not permit it to be used as a club to further beat down the price. I will withdraw it from the market and I will borrow money on it out of the revolving fund, pay the merchant and pay the banker, and hold the cotton until I am justified in selling."

If we could do something to accomplish that, we would be walking on solid ground, and giving the farmer something substantial.

Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senator from Oregon, if the Senator would accept an amendment, on line 18, page 13, at the end of the line, just before the word "agencies," to insert the word "farm," and then in line 20, before the word "agencies," to insert the same word, so as to make it read "agreement with other farm agencies, but shall not unreasonably discriminate between such other farm agencies," I think that might meet the objection. If the Senator would accept that amendment I think it would clear up the language and make it certain that nobody but farmers and their real representatives could get any of this fund.

Mr. McNARY. Then the distinguished Senator from Alabama would take the position that there is no opportunity for the packers or the converters in any way to deprive the farmers of any just profit?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am not in favor of depriving them of any just profit.

Mr. McNARY. I inquire if the acceptance of the amendment would cause the Senator to think the thing about which he complains would be entirely removed from the bill?

Mr. HEFLIN. I think it would at least confine it to the farmers and to the farming class.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator would not expect the farming class in any way to injure the farmer?

Mr. HEFLIN. I would not expect the farming class to do it if they are real bona fide farmers.

Mr. McNARY. I explained a moment ago the purpose of the present language. I think no one would question that there is no intention, under any construction that might be placed on the language, to deprive the farmer of any of his just profits. I am inclined to yield to the Senator from Alabama, on account of his tenderness for the farmer, by accepting the amendment, so far as I may do so, provided he believes there is no possibility left in the bill to deprive the farmer of any of his just rights.

Mr. McKELLAR. Accept the amendment and let us vote.

Mr. HEFLIN. All the Senator has to do is to accept the amendment and not have me give him my opinion about it. I hope there is nothing else in the bill to criticize, but I do not want to commit myself too far.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. SACKETT]. [After a pause.] The Chair is informed that the amendment of the Senator from Alabama is first in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Oregon accepted that amendment.

Mr. McNARY. I can not assume the responsibility for accepting it. I can merely indicate my approval.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I note the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the pending amendment be first stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 12 of the original print, line 25, after the word "other," insert the word "farm"; and on page 13, line 1, after the word "other," insert the word "farm," so it will read: "The board may enter into agreement with other farm agencies, but shall not unreasonably distinguish between such other farm agencies."

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, how does this amendment take precedence over the amendment which I offered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Because, as the Chair understands, it is an amendment to the paragraph which the Senator from Kentucky proposes to strike from the bill. It is perfecting the part proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. HEFLIN. My amendment has nothing to do with the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am endeavoring to find out what the amendment is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has just been reported by the clerk.

Mr. BORAH. I understood his reading, but I have not got the effect of the amendment. Is the effect of the amendment to take out the clause to which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] objected?

Mr. McNARY. The Senator can speak for himself, but the burden of his complaint, as I understand it, is that there might be a possibility of doing a great wrong to the farmer by entering into contracts with the packer and the miller to take care of certain surpluses. That also was the fear expressed by the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]. In order to meet the situation I was willing to accept the amendment submitted by the Senator from Alabama, namely, that the word "farm" be inserted so that it would read "other farm agencies."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was correct in his first statement that the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky is in order. On it the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BROOKHART obtained the floor.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I note the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to submit a request?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I ask unanimous consent that we may vote upon the proposal submitted by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] prior to taking the vote upon the pending amendment of the Senator from Kentucky. I shall withdraw the request if it leads to any discussion whatever.

Mr. BRUCE. I am very sorry, but I have some reasons, which seem to me, at least, substantial, why I can not enter into the request.

Mr. McNARY. Very well.

Mr. SACKETT. I ask for a vote on the pending amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the point of order.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Kentucky has moved to strike out the section providing for the equalization fee.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I have not yielded the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina raises a point of order.

Mr. BROOKHART. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. SIMMONS. While that question is pending, an amendment is offered to a provision which it is proposed to strike out. The point of order I make is that the first vote should be a vote on that amendment, because it is in the nature of perfecting the very section which it is proposed by the Senator from Kentucky to strike out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Alabama does not propose to perfect the section which the Senator from Kentucky moves to strike out.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is it not an amendment to amend before we strike out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the second amendment refers to section 7 and the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky is to strike out section 8.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well. I understand the point of order is overruled. I desire to be recognized in my own right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. I beg the pardon of the Senator from Iowa. I did not know that he had been recognized.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a few moments before allowing a vote on the elimination of the equalization fee. I am not one of those who has any objection to the equalization fee, in and of itself. There is some question about its constitutionality. If I were the court I would hold it to be constitutional, but I am not the court. Neither is the Senate. I shall not discuss the constitutionality phase of it. I shall only discuss briefly the economic phases of it.
